PHOTIUS, patriarch of Constantinople in the ninth century, was a native of that city. He rose to the highest offices of the state, before he entered into orders, which took place on the deposition of Ignatius in 858. Photius was deprived in his turn by Basilus in 867, but after living in exile eleven years, he forcibly regained his seat, which he kept till 886, and was then deprived by the emperor Leo, who sent him into Armenia, where he died. His "Bibliotheca" contains the substance of near three hundred ancient authors. He had great talents, but was intriguing, and it was principally through his conduct that the separation of the eastern and western churches took place.

PHRYNICUS, a tragic poet of Athens, who first introduced female parts into the drama, and the wearing of masks by the actors. He wrote nine tragedies, and gained the prize B.C. 511.

PIA, PHILIP NICHOLAS, an eminent chemist, was born at Paris, in 1721. He distinguished himself by an establishment for the recovery of drowned persons, but the revolution destroyed the useful work, and reduced the author to poverty. Died, 1790.

PIAZZA, JEROME BARTHOLOMEW, a native of Alexandria, in Italy, who had been a judge in the Inquisition, but on embracing the protestant religion he quitted Italy and settled in England. He taught the Italian and French at Cambridge, where he died about 1745. He wrote a curious account of the Inquisition.

PIAZETTA, JOHN BAPTIST, a celebrated painter of Venice, was born in 1662, and died in 1754. His figures are well designed and executed, and are much in the style of Michael Angelo Buonarroti.

PIAZZI, a celebrated Italian astronomer, was born in 1746, at Ponte, in the Val-tine; entered into the order of the Theatines; and, after having been a professor at Genoa, Malta, Ravenna, and Palermo, was in 1787 made director of the observatory founded in the latter city. About this time he visited Paris and London, and entered into a correspondence with the most celebrated European astronomers. In 1801 he discovered a new planet, which he named Ceres Ferdinandea; and in 1805 he made a new catalogue of 7646 fixed stars. This distinguished astronomer produced various treatises and memoirs of great importance to the science; and was a member of many learned institutions. Died, 1805.

PICARD, JOHN, an eminent mathematician, and prior of Rille in Anjou, was a native of La Fleche. He was engaged in measuring a degree of the meridian, and in determining the meridian of France; was the first who applied the telescope to quadrants, and the first who observed the mercurial phosphorus in the barometer. Died, 1683.

PICART, BERNARD, an eminent engraver, was born at Paris in 1674, and died in 1733.

PICCINI, NICHOLAS, a celebrated musician, was born at Bari, in the Kingdom of Naples. From Italy he went to Paris, but in the revolution Piccini returned to Naples, where he was described as being a Jacobin; on which he went again to France; and died at Passy, in 1800, aged 73. His principal operas are, "Roland," "Atys," "Iphigenia in Tauris," and "Dido." Piccini was a most industrious and original composer; more than three hundred operas, besides numerous oratorios, cantatas, &c. having been produced by him. When Gluck was in the zenith of his reputation, a spirited contest was maintained between Piccini and him respecting the comparative excellencies of the German and Italian schools, and all Paris was for a time interested in the question.

PICHEGRU, CHARLES, a celebrated general of the French republic, was born, 1761, of poor parents, at Arbois, in Franche-Comté; was educated in a monastery, and afterwards studied at the college of Brienne, where he distinguished himself by his progress in mathematical science. At an early age, he enlisted as a private soldier, and went with his regiment to America. After his return, he was made serjeant-major; and soon after the commencement of the revolution, he attained the rank of general of division. In 1794 he took the command of the army of the North, where he was embarrassed by many difficulties arising from the flight of generals Dumouriez and Lafayette. He, however, restored order and discipline; and undertook the conquest of Holland, the most brilliant of all his exploits. The Convention now conferred on him the chief command of the army of the Rhine and Moselle; but he retained at the same time the command of the army of the North, under Moreau, and of the army of the Meuse, under Jourdan. In April, 1795, he was recalled, to take command of the capital, where the terrorists were making efforts to recover their power. Having suppressed the insurrection of the faubourgs, for which he was called in the convention "the saviour of the country," he returned to the army of the Rhine, where, however, his career, hitherto so brilliant, now took another turn. He entered into negotiations with the prince of Condé, to co-operate in the restoration of the Bourbons, but the secret was soon revealed to the French government, who, however, being too weak at the moment to bring him to an account, he was recalled in 1796, under pretence of going ambassador to Sweden. Pichegru declined the post, but was blind enough not to perceive the storm which threatened him; and, instead of saving himself while it was still time, retired to an estate near Arbois. In March, 1797, he was chosen deputy from the department of Jura to the council of five hundred. He only retained his office till the 4th of September, when a new revolution taking place, he was one of the sixty-five deputies, who, together with Carnot and Barthelemy, two of the directors, were declared by their condutors guilty of a royalist conspiracy, and condemned to deportation. Pichegru, with others, was sent to Cayenne, whence he made his escape to England; and while there he became acquainted with Georges Cadoudal, the Chouan chief, and readily entered into the plans of the emigrants to effect the overthrow of Buonaparte's government. Having been landed on the French coast by captain Wright, in January, 1804, with several of the old Vendean leaders, they repaired in disguise to Paris, hoping to find a party favourable to their views; but the police (under Fouché) discovered the plot, and both Georges and Pichegru were arrested. The latter was confined in the Temple, and a process commenced against him; but he was found one morning strangled in prison, April the 6th, 1804. In this country it was believed that his death proceeded from the direct command of Buonaparte; but there is no positive evidence to support the accusation.

PICKEN, ANDREW, a miscellaneous writer, was born at Paisley, in Scotland, in 1788. After some unsuccessful attempts of a commercial nature, he entered on a literary career, by publishing a volume, entitled "Tales and Sketches of the West of Scotland." This was followed by "The Sectarian," and "The Dominic's Legacy;" the latter of which established his fame as the delineator of Scottish humble life. He subsequently engaged in writing tales, &c. for the periodical press; and a short time previous to his death, appeared his "Traditional Stories of Old Families," in 2 vols., designed as the first part of a series, which was intended to embrace the legendary history of Great Britain and Ireland. His death took place in November, 1833; and a novel, entitled "The Black Watch," which he had just completed, was afterwards published.

PICTET, BENEDICT, a divine and historian, was born at Geneva in 1655. He became professor of theology in his native city, and died there in 1734. His principal works are, "Theologia Christiana," 3 vols. 4to.; "Christian Morality," 8 vols. 12mo.; and a "History of the 12th and 13th Centuries," 2 vols. 4to.

PICTET, MARK AUGUSTUS, a natural philosopher, was born in 1753, at Geneva, at the university of which place he succeeded Saussure as professor of philosophy. Among his works is a "Three Months' Journey in England, Scotland and Ireland." Died, 1835.

PICTET DE RICHEMONT, CHARLES, a brother of the preceding, was born at Geneva, in 1755. After several years spent in the military service, he retired to his estate and occupied himself in agricultural and literary pursuits; but was subsequently called on to fill a public situation, and in 1815 he appeared as negotiator for Switzerland at Paris, Vienna, and Berlin. He translated various works from the English; conducted, in conjunction with his brother and M. Maurice, "The Britanic Library;" and wrote "A Course of Agriculture," and other works on the same subject. Died, 1824.

PICTON, SIR THOMAS, K.C.B., &c., a gallant British officer, was descended from an ancient family of Pembrokeshire, and commenced his military career as an ensign in the 12th regiment of foot in 1771. He served on the Gibraltar station till 1778; after which he was promoted to a captaincy in the 75th. In 1794 he embarked for the West Indies; and after the reduction of St. Lucia and Trinidad in 1797, he rose to the rank of colonel, and was appointed governor of the latter island. Whilst holding that situation he was applied to by a Spanish magistrate to sign an order for inflicting the torture on a female slave, named Louisa Calderon; and on being told it was a customary practice, he signed it without inquiry. The girl, who was only fourteen years of age, was accordingly picketed, with a view to extort from her the discovery of a theft committed by her paramour. For this act of cruelty the governor was, in 1806, indicted, and found guilty by an English jury. As many exaggerated rumours had preceded the colonel to England, a new trial was granted, and though he was acquitted of moral guilt, the deed was one which threw a shade over his bright career. However, in 1809, he was again employed for his country. He was at the siege of Flushing, and on its capture was appointed governor. From Flushing he returned to England an invalid; but was soon again in the field. His courage and intrepidity shone on every occasion; ever foremost in the fight, he was a victorious leader at Badajos, at Vittoria, at Ciudad Rodrigo, &c. At the battle of Waterloo general Picton commanded the 5th division of the army, and fell in a moment of glory, having just repulsed one of the most serious attacks made by the enemy. A monument to his memory was voted by the parliament, and erected in St. Paul's cathedral.

PICUS, JOHN, of Mirandola, was the youngest son of John Francis Picus, prince of Mirandola, and born in 1463. He is said to have been acquainted with twenty-two languages when he was but eighteen, and was accordingly accounted a prodigy of erudition. He was also master of all the liberal arts, an admirable poet, and a skillful disputant. In 1486 he went to Rome, where he published a challenge, offering to dispute on nine hundred propositions on different subjects. Instead, however, of being answered as he expected, a charge of heresy was brought against him; he was accordingly compelled to leave Rome; and, settling at Florence on an estate given to him by Lorenzo de Medici, he gave up his latter years to the study of theology; and died in 1494.

PICUS, JOHN FRANCIS, nephew of the preceding, was born about 1469. He wrote several theological works, poems, &c.; and was assassinated in his castle, together with his son, by his nephew, in 1533.

PIERCE, EDWARD, an English painter in the reigns of Charles I. and II. He was eminent in history and landscapes; but as his works chiefly consisted of altarpieces and ceilings of churches, there are few of his pictures in existence, most of them having been destroyed in the fire of London.—One of his sons was an excellent sculptor, and executed the statues of Sir Thomas Gresham and Edward III. which ornamented the Royal Exchange before it was destroyed by fire, Jan. 10, 1638.

PIERRE, JACQUES BERNARDIN HENRI DE ST., a most ingenious and philosophical French author, was born at Havre, in 1737; was educated in the engineer school at Paris; for a time followed the military profession in the service of Russia; afterwards obtained a commission in the engineer corps of France; and, retiring from a military life, he devoted the remainder of his days to literature. In 1784, appeared his "Etudes de la Nature," and in 1788, his "Paul et Virginie," which, after passing through fifty impressions in one year, has been translated into almost all the languages of Europe. Napoleon conferred on him the order of the legion of honour, and Joseph Buonaparte granted him a pension of 6000 francs. St. Pierre was also the author of "La Chaumière Indienne," and several other works, all replete with elegant taste and philosophical feeling. Died, 1814.

PIGALLE, JOHN BAPTIST, an eminent sculptor, was born at Paris, in 1714. He studied in Italy, and on his return to France became sculptor to the king, chancellor of the academy of painting, and a knight of the order of St. Michael. Died, 1785.

PIGNORIUS, LAURENCE, a learned Italian, was born at Padua, in 1571. He was an ecclesiastic and canon of Treviso, where he died of the plague in 1631. He was the friend of Galileo, and published several erudite works on classical antiquities.

PIGNOTTI, LAURENCE, an Italian poet and historian, was born at Figliena, in Tuscany, in 1739; was educated at Arezzo and Pisa; practised as a physician at Florence; was created historiographer of the court, member of the council of public instruction, and finally rector of the university of Pisa. His "Fables" have acquired an extensive popularity; but his great fame was acquired by his inimitable "History of Tuscany." Died, 1812.

PILATUS, LEONTIUS, a monk of Calabria in the 14th century. He was the master of Petrarch and Boccaccio; and on his return from Greece, where he had been in search of manuscripts, he was killed by lightning.

PILES, ROGER DE, a French painter and a writer on painting, was born in 1635, at Clameci. In 1693 he was sent by the French ministry into Holland as a secret negotiator, or spy, but being discovered by the Dutch, they imprisoned him for five years, during which period he wrote his "Lives of the Painters." He was also the author of "Dialogues on the Knowledge of Painting;" "A Dissertation on the Works of famous Painters;" "Elements of practical Painting," &c. Died, 1709.

PILKINGTON, JAMES, an English bishop, was born at Rivington, in Lancashire, in 1520, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became master. During the persecution under Mary, he was obliged to leave the kingdom, but on the accession of Elizabeth he was made bishop of Durham; and died in 1575. He wrote some valuable "Commentaries on the Scriptures."

PILKINGTON, LETITIA, a female writer, was the daughter of Dr. Van Lewen, a physician of Dublin, and born there in 1712. She became the wife of the Rev. Matthew Pilkington, from whom she was separated on account of the irregularity of her conduct. After this she settled in London, where she subsisted partly by writing, and partly by the bounty of her literary friends. She wrote "The Roman Father," a tragedy; and "The Turkish Count, or London Apprentice," a comedy; "Memoirs of her Life;" and various miscellaneous poems, &c. Died, 1750.

PILPAY, an oriental fabulist, was a Bramin of Hindoostan, and counsellor to one of the rajahs. He is said to have flourished 2000 years before the Christian era. His fables were translated from the Persian into French, by Galland, in 1714.

PINDAR, the most famous lyric poet of ancient Greece, was born at Thebes, in Boeotia, about 540 B.C. He quitted his native country, which was proverbial for the stupidity of its inhabitants, and went to Athens, where the greatest honours were bestowed upon him. But his principal patron was Hiero, king of Syracuse, at whose court he is supposed to have resided the latter part of his life. He expired in the public theatre, in his fifty-fifth year. Such was the respect paid to his memory, that when the Lacedæmonians took Thebes, they spared his house, as also did Alexander the Great. Of his works, which were numerous, and in various kinds of composition, there are now extant only four books of Odes; but they are amply sufficient to vindicate his claim to be ranked among the most illustrious of the ancient bards.

PINDEMONTE, HIPPOLITO, count, an eminent Italian poet, was born at Verona, in 1733, and distinguished himself at a very early age by the beauty of his lyrical compositions. He travelled in England, France, Holland, Germany, &c., forming acquaintance with men of worth and ability, and obtaining the esteem of all who knew him. Died, 1823.

PINE, JOHN, an eminent engraver, was born in 1680, and died in 1756. He executed some large plates of the tapestry hangings in the House of Lords, which were so approved, that the parliament passed an act to secure to him the emolument arising from them. He also engraved the text of Horace, and the Bucolics and Georgics of Virgil, illustrated with gems and bas-reliefs.

PINEAU, GABRIEL DU, a lawyer, was born at Angers, in 1573. He distinguished himself by his pleadings, and was appointed counsellor to the presidial of Angers, where his reputation was such as to procure him the appellation of "Father of the People." Died, 1644.

PINEL, PHILIP, an eminent French physician, particularly distinguished for the important improvements he introduced in the treatment of patients labouring under insanity. Among his works are, "A Medico-philosophical Treatise on Mental Alienation;" "Philosophical Nosography;" and "Clinical Medicine." He practised with great success at Paris, where he also acquired much popularity by his lectures. Born, 1742; died, 1826.

PINGERON, JEAN CLAUDE, a French writer, born at Lyons, in 1730. He was a captain of artillery in the Polish service, and afterwards travelled a great deal. When he settled, he devoted his attention to literature, and published a number of works, chiefly translations from the Italian. Died, 1795.

PINGRE, ALEXANDER GUY, a French astronomer, was born at Paris, in 1711. He was originally an ecclesiastic; and though he began the study of astronomy at a late period, he distinguished himself by the zeal and success with which he followed it. In 1760 he made a voyage to the island of Diego Rodriguez, to observe the transit of Venus; and undertook three subsequent voyages, to try the chronometers of Berthoud and Le Roy. The most important of his works is, his "Cometographie," 2 vols. 4to. Died, 1796.

PINKERTON, JOHN, a prolific but eccentric author, was born at Edinburgh, in 1758. He was educated at Lanark grammar school, and served five years with a writer of the signet; after which he settled in London, and devoted the remainder of his life to literature. He began his career by a volume of miscellaneous poetry, unassumingly entitled "Rhymes." This work was followed by two others, one containing "Dithyrambic Odes," &c., the other entitled "Tales in Verse." He also produced two volumes of pretended "Ancient Scottish Poems," a forgery after the manner of Chatterton; and "Letters on Literature," under the assumed name of Robert Heron, in which he displayed a degree of impudent pedantry almost unparalleled. It, however, obtained him the patronage of Horace Walpole; of whose witticisms, &c. he published a collection after his decease, under the title of "Walpoleiana." A bare catalogue of the works of this indefatigable writer would fill a considerable space. Among them are, an excellent "Essay on Medals;" "Modern Geography," 3 vols.; "The Treasury of Wit," 3 vols.; "General Collection of Voyages and Travels," 19 vols.; "Iconographia Scotica," 2 vols.; "Recollections of Paris," 2 vols.; and "Petrology, or a Treatise on Rocks," 2 vols. For many years Mr. Pinkerton resided at Paris, and there died in 1826.

PINSON, RICHARD, printer to Henry VII. and VIII. was a native of Normandy, and became servant to William Caxton. He printed Magna Charta, and several books which are now scarce and valuable. He died about 1530.

PIOMBO, SEBASTIANO DEL, an eminent painter, born at Venice, in 1485. He renounced music, of which he was very fond, for painting, and studied under Bellini, but afterwards took the fine colouring of Giorgione as a model. The delicacy of his pencil was much admired; and Michael Angelo encouraged him to enter into competition with Raphael, and even supplied him with designs, which Piombo often executed very happily, although by no means capable of lofty conceptions or sublime inventions. His greatest work is his "Resurrection of Lazarus," now in our National Gallery. Died, 1547.

PIOZZI, HEATER LYNCH, born in 1730, was the daughter of John Salisbury, esq., a gentleman of Carnarvonshire. Early in life, she was distinguished by her beauty and accomplishments, and, in 1763, married Mr. Thrale, a brewer of great opulence in Southwark, which borough he then represented in parliament. Soon after commenced her acquaintance with doctor Johnson, of whom, in 1786, she published "Anecdotes," in one octavo volume. On the death of Mr. Thrale, in 1781, she retired to Bath, where she married Piozzi, an Italian music-master, with whom she went abroad. At Florence she formed one of the associated English, who conducted a kind of poetical magazine there, in which the effusions of Mrs. Piozzi figured conspicuously. Her subsequent publications are, "Observations and Reflections made in a Journey through France, Italy, and Germany," 2 vols. 8vo.; "The Florence Miscellany," 8vo.; "British Synonymy," 2 vols. 8vo.; and "The Retrospect," 2 vols. 4to. But she is now chiefly remembered as an authoress by her ingenious tale of "The Three Warnings." On the death of her second husband, Mrs. Piozzi returned to England, and died at Clifton in 1821.

PIPER, FRANCIS LE, an English comic painter, was born in Kent, where he inherited a handsome estate. He painted only for amusement, and chiefly such subjects as afforded him an opportunity for indulging in caricature; his talent for drawing faces remarkable for singularity of expression, or whimsical combination of feature, being unrivalled. Died, 1740.

PIPER, CHARLES, count, chief minister of Charles XII. of Sweden. He was born of obscure parents, and by his talents raised himself to the eminent station he occupied. He accompanied Charles in all his campaigns; was taken by the Russians at the battle of Pultowa; and died a prisoner in the fortress of Schlüsselburg, in 1716.

PIRANESI, JOHN BAPTIST, an eminent engraver, architect, and antiquary, was born at Venice, about 1711, but lived principally at Rome, of which city, with its models of ancient and modern art, he was an enthusiastic admirer. He was one of the most indefatigable of artists, and his talents were equal to his industry: his works form sixteen atlas folio volumes, and delineate, in the most spirited manner, most of the remarkable ancient edifices and objects of antiquity in the papal states, together with numerous views and modern buildings. Died, 1778.

PIRANESI, FRANCIS, a son of the preceding, and, like him, an artist of great talent, was born at Rome, in 1748. He completed many of the magnificent works begun by his father, and executed many others of equal magnitude; in which he was assisted by his brother Peter and his sister Laura. Having taken an active part in the revolution, he ultimately found it necessary to quit his native country; and he continued to reside at Paris from that time till his death, in 1810.

PIRON, ALEXIS, a French poet and dramatist, was born at Dijon, in 1689, and was about to become a barrister, when a reverse of fortune happening to his parents, he was compelled to abandon that intention, and seek a subsistence from literary efforts. Having for a while earned a scanty subsistence at Paris as a copyist, he turned his thoughts to dramatic composition, and produced a piece for the Comic Opera, entitled "Arlequin Deuotion." This succeeding, he was encouraged to persevere, and "L'Ecole des Pères," a comedy; and the tragedies of "Callisthene" and "Gustave Vasa" followed. It was not, however, till 1738 that he gained a place among the highest class of dramatists, by his admirable comedy of "Metromanic" which Laharpe characterizes as, "excelling in plot, style, humour, and vivacity almost every other composition of the kind." His "Bon Mots," "Poésies Diverses," and "Plays," form seven volumes. Died 1773.

PISISTRATUS, an Athenian citizen who usurped the sovereignty of his country, was a descendant of Codrus, and inherited from his father, Hippocrates, a large fortune. He was ambitious, eloquent, and courageous; and, pursuing the policy which has so often succeeded in democracies, he gained over the lower classes of the citizens by his affability and unbounded liberality. He made no attempt to abolish the wise laws of Solon, but confirmed and extended their authority; and though he was twice expelled, he regained the sovereignty, and continued to exercise it, not as the oppressor, but as the father of his country. He died 527 B.C., leaving his two sons, Hippias and Hipparchus, to inherit his power. He established a public library at Athens, and collected and arranged the poems of Homer.

PISCATOR, or FISCHER, JOHN, a Protestant divine, born at Strasburg, in 1546. He was successively a Lutheran, a Calvinist, and an Armenian; translated the Bible into German; wrote several works; was professor of theology at Herborn; and died in 1626.

PISTORIUS, a polemic of the 16th century, was born at Nidda, in 1546. He was at first a physician; then a lawyer, and rose to be one of the counsellors of state in the court of Baden Dourlach; but his religious opinions undergoing a change, he took orders, and, as a Romish priest, wrote violently against Lutheranism and its professors. He finally became prelate of the abbey of Fulda, and provost of the cathedral of Breslau, with the rank of imperial counsellor. Died, 1608.

PITCAIRNE, ARCHIBALD, an eminent physician, born at Edinburgh, in 1682. After receiving his education in his native city and at Paris, he was for a short time professor of medicine at Leyden, and eventually settled at Edinburgh. Among his works are, "Solutio Problematis de Inventoribus;" "Disputationes Medice;" "Elementa Medicinæ Physico-mathematicæ;" and "Dissertatio de Legibus Naturæ." Died, 1713.

PITHOU, PIERRE, an eminent French writer on jurisprudence and philology, was born at Troyes, in 1539. Being a Calvinist, and at Paris during the massacre of St. Bartholomew's day, he narrowly escaped becoming one of the victims. He afterwards conformed to the Catholic church; was employed in many public affairs; and used all his influence to promote the submission of the city of Paris to the authority of Henry IV. Died, 1596.

PITISCUS, BARTHOLOMEW, a divine and mathematician, was born in Silesia, in 1561, and died at Heidelberg, where he was first preacher to the court, in 1613. He wrote "Synopsis Theologicæ Methodicæ;" "Theaurus Mathematicus;" "Liber pro Reformatione Ecclesiarum Anhaltinæ;"

PITOT, HENRY, a mathematician, was born in Langwedoc, in 1693; and in 1740 was appointed engineer to his native province, and inspector-general of the canal, which forms a junction between the Mediterranean and the Bay of Biscay. One of his principal works was that of supplying Montpellier with water; for which he received the order of St. Michael. He was also a member of the academy of sciences, and of the royal society of London. Died, 1771.

PITT, CHRISTOPHER, an English clergyman and an elegant poet, was born in 1699, at Blandford, in Dorsetshire; was educated at Winchester and at New college, Oxford; and having obtained the family living of Pimperne, he there passed his life, in the performance of his clerical duties, and the cultivation of literature, beloved and respected for his suavity of manners and general benevolence. His poems have considerable merit; and his translations of the "Æneid" and "Vida's Art of Poetry," are both tasteful and harmonious. He died in 1748.

PITT, THOMAS, the founder of an illustrious family, was born at St. Mary's, Blandford, in 1633. Towards the end of that century, he went to the East Indies, as governor of Fort St. George, where he resided many years, and realized a large fortune; particularly by a diamond (called after him the Pitt diamond) which he purchased for 20,000*l.*, and sold to the king of France for somewhat more than five times that sum. A rumour having prevailed in England, that the governor gained this jewel unfairly, and Pope having most unwarrantably given the slander currency, by a sort of poetical adoption of it in the following couplet—

"Asleep and naked as an Indian lay,
An honest factor stole a gem away," he published a narrative containing a fair statement of the transaction, which completely refuted the calumny. In 1716 Mr. Pitt was made governor of Jamaica, but did not hold that situation above a year. He sat in four parliaments, for Old Sarum and Thirsk; died in 1726; and was buried in Blandford church, where a monument was erected to his memory.—His eldest son, ROBERT PITT, of Boconnoc, who died in 1727, was the father of the great lord Chatham.

PITT, WILLIAM, an illustrious English statesman, was the second son of the earl of Chatham, and born May 28, 1730, at Hayes, in Kent. After receiving the rudiments of his education at home, under the watchful superintendence of his father, he was sent to Pembroke-hall, Cambridge, where his tutor was Dr. Prettymann; and on leaving the university he was entered at Lincoln's-inn, and in three years was called to the bar. But he was destined shortly to move in a higher sphere. In 1750 he stood candidate for the university of Cambridge, but was unsuccessful. By means, however, of Sir James Lowther, he was returned for the borough of Appby, and he immediately became one of the most distinguished opponents of the ministry. In 1752 he brought forward a motion for an enquiry into the state of the representation in parliament, which was rejected by a small majority. On the death of the marquis of Rockingham, lord Shelburne obtained the office of first lord of the treasury; and Mr. Pitt, then only twenty-three years of age, was appointed chancellor of the exchequer. A general peace soon followed, which being made the ground of censure by a strong opposition, the cabinet was dissolved, and the Fox and North coalition took its place. On his retirement from office, Mr. Pitt resumed his efforts for a reform in parliament, and submitted three specific motions on the subject, which, although supported by Mr. Fox, then secretary of state, were rejected. On the failure of the India bill of the latter, which produced the dismissal of the coalition, Mr. Pitt, although at that time only in his twenty-fourth year, assumed the station of prime minister, by accepting the united posts of first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer. Although strongly supported by the sovereign, he stood opposed to a large majority of the house of commons, and a dissolution took place in March, 1786. At the general election which followed, the voice of the nation appeared decidedly in his favour, and some of the strongest aristocratical interests in the country were defeated; Mr. Pitt himself being returned by the university of Cambridge. His first measure was the passing of his India bill, establishing the board of control, which was followed by much of that fiscal and financial regulation, which gave éclat to the early period of his administration. One of the most momentous periods in modern history had now arrived. The French revolution broke out, and produced a vibration in every neighbouring state. War against free principles was declared on the one side, by which all amelioration was opposed; while, on the other, the friends of rational reformation found themselves confounded with ignorant and heated men, who espoused some of the wildest and most visionary innovations. Under this state of things a vigilant eye and a steady hand were obviously necessary to steer the vessel of state; and whatever opinions may be formed by different parties, in respect to the necessity of our interference, or the measures adopted by the minister—whether he deserved the censures which were so lavishly heaped upon him, or whether he was entitled to the gratitude of his country, as "the pilot that weathered the storm,"—certain it is, that he displayed talents, energy, and perseverance, almost unparalleled in the world's history. At length he acceded to the wish that an experiment for peace should be tried, which took place in 1801, under Mr. Addington; but the event proved how fallacious were the hopes of the people; and, in 1804, Mr. Pitt once more resumed his post at the treasury. Returning to power as a war minister, he exerted all the energy of his character to render the contest successful, and found means to engage the two great military powers of Russia and Austria in a new coalition, which was dissolved by the battle of Austerlitz. But his health was now in a very precarious state, and an hereditary gout, aggravated by public cares, and a too liberal use of wine, by way of stimulant, completely undermined his constitution; and he died Jan. 23, 1806. Mr. Pitt was a minister of commanding powers, both as a financier and an orator; his eloquence, though not so imaginative as that of Burke, or so captivating as that of his father, was more uniformly just and impressive than either; while the indignant severity and keenness of his sarcasm were unequalled. A public funeral was decreed to his honour by parliament, as also a grant of 40,000*l.* to pay his debts; for although his whole life was devoted to the service of his country, such was his disinterestedness in pecuniary matters, that he never received one shilling of the public money beyond his fair emoluments of office, to supply the occasional great expenses to which he was put as prime minister.

PITT, WILLIAM MORTON, a gentleman who, for thirty-six years, was the representative of the county of Dorset, and who, throughout a long life, might be deemed a public man,—was the son of John Pitt, esq. of Encombe, and born in 1754. He first entered the House of Commons in 1780, as member for Poole; was re-chosen in 1784; and in 1790 became a county member, which he continued to be till he retired from parliamentary duties in 1826. In all the various duties he had to perform, whether in the senate or as a county magistrate, he devoted his time and talents to the public good; while in private life he exercised a diffusive philanthropy, and made the moral improvement of the poorer classes an object of his peculiar care. Died, Feb. 1836, aged 82.

PITTACUS, one of the seven sages of Greece, was born at Mitylene, in the island of Lesbos, about 650 B.C. He was a warrior as well as a philosopher; expelled the tyrant Melancthus from Lesbos; and on becoming its sovereign, he discharged the duties of his station in the most exemplary manner; and died, after a reign of ten years, B.C. 570.

PIUS VI., whose secular name was JOHN ANGELO BRASCHI, was born at Cesena, in 1717, and succeeded pope Clement XIV. in 1775. His first act was to make a reform in the public treasury; he then completed the museum in the Vatican; but the greatest work of his pontificate was the draining of the Pontine marshes,—a project which baffled several of the emperors, and many of the popes. When the emperor Joseph II. decreed that all the religious orders in his dominions were free from papal jurisdiction, Pius, apprehensive of the consequences of such a measure, went in person to Vienna in 1783; but though he was honourably received, his remonstrances were ineffectual. The French revolution, however, was of more serious consequence to the papal see. The pope having favoured the allies, Buonaparte entered the ecclesiastical territory, and compelled him to purchase a peace by the contribution of several millions, and delivering up the finest works of painting and sculpture. Basseville was then sent as envoy from the republic to Rome, where he behaved with so much insolence, that the people assassinated him in 1793. General Duphot entered the city with his troops to restore order; but the papal soldiers routed them, and Duphot was slain. On this, Buonaparte again entered Italy, and made the pope prisoner in the capital, which was plundered. The venerable pontiff was carried away by the victors, and hurried over the Alps to Valence, where he died of excessive fatigue and ill-usage, Aug. 29, 1799.

PIUS VII., or GREGORY BARNABAS CHIARAMONTI, the successor of the preceding pontiff, was born at Cesena, in 1744. He was raised to the cardinalate in 1765; and when Buonaparte entered Imola, in 1796, the cardinal, who was also bishop of that see, found means to conciliate the favour of the French general, and thereby paved the way for his elevation to the papacy in 1800. In July, 1801, he signed the concordat; and in 1804 he crowned Napoleon at Paris; but refused to perform the same office for Louis XVIII. Notwithstanding the courtesy which he showed to Buonaparte, the latter seized the pope, in 1809, and imprisoned him at Fontainebleau, where he remained till the downfall of his oppressor, in 1814, when he returned to Rome, to resume his authority. He died in 1823; and was succeeded in the pontificate by cardinal Sella Genga, who assumed the appellation of Pius XII.

PIUS VIII., by name FRANCIS XAVIERO CASTIGLIONI, was born at Cingolia, in 1761; was made bishop of Montalto, in 1800; created cardinal in 1816; was elected pope on the death of Leo XII. in 1829; and died in the following year. He was distinguished for his industry, talents, and learning; spared no expense to preserve the remains of ancient architecture in Rome; and was a sincere patron of the fine arts. Clement XVI. was his successor.

PIZARRO, FRANCISCO, the conqueror of Peru, was the illegitimate son of a gentleman in Truxillo, and being left entirely dependent on his mother, a peasant girl, he received no education, and was, in his early years employed as a swineherd. Quitting this inglorious occupation, he embarked, with some other adventurers, for America; and, in 1534, associated at Panama with Diego de Almagro, and Hernandez Lucque, a priest, in an enterprise to make discoveries. In this voyage they fell in with the coast of Peru, but being too few to make any attempt at a settlement, Pizarro returned to Spain, where all that he gained was a power from the court to prosecute his object. However, having raised some money, he was enabled again, in 1531, to visit Peru, where a civil war was then raging between Huascar, the legitimate monarch, and his half-brother, Atahualpa, or Atabalipa, as he is variously called, the reigning Inca. Pizarro, by pretending to take the part of the latter, was permitted to march into the interior, where he made the unsuspecting chief his prisoner, while partaking of a friendly banquet to which he had invited him and his whole court; then extorting from him, as it is said, a house full of the precious metals, by way of ransom, he had him tried for a pretended conspiracy, and condemned him to be burnt, allowing him first to be strangled, as a reward for becoming a Christian. In 1535 the conqueror laid the foundation of Lima; but, in 1537, a contest arose between him and Almagro, who was defeated and executed. The son and friends of Almagro, however, avenged his death, and on June 26, 1541, after ruling despotically for six years, Pizarro met with the fate he so richly deserved, being assassinated in his palace at Lima.

PLACE, FRANCIS, a native of Dinsdale, in the county of Durham. He was bred to the law, and afterwards expended considerable sums in an attempt to make porcelain. He was an excellent painter as well as engraver; but executed all his works for amusement; and he refused a pension of 500*l.* to draw the royal navy. His etchings of landscapes and birds are admirable; and his portraits in mezzotinto also prove that he possessed great abilities. Died, 1728.

PLACE, or PLATEANUS, PETER DE LA, a French magistrate and writer, was born at Angoulême, in 1526. He became a pleader in the parliament of Paris, till he was appointed by the prince of Condé superintendent of his household. Unfortunately he returned to Paris, and while discharging his duty as president of the court of aids, was murdered in the massacre of St. Bartholomew in 1572. His works are, "Commentaries on the State of Religion and the Commonwealth;" "A Treatise on the Use of Moral Philosophy;" and "A Treatise on the Excellence of the Christian Religion."

PLATINA, BARTOLOMEO, an historian, whose real name was Sacchi, was born in 1421. Having fallen under the displeasure of pope Pius II., he was imprisoned and put to the rack, on a charge of being implicated in a conspiracy against him. His sufferings, however, were afterwards recompensed by Sixtus IV., who, in 1475, made him keeper of the Vatican library. His principal work, composed in elegant Latin, is a history of the "Lives of the Roman Pontiffs." He also wrote, in Latin, a "History of Mantua." Died, 1481.

PLATO, one of the most illustrious philosophers of antiquity, and the founder of the academic sect, was born in the island of Aegina, in the 68th Olympiad, or B.C. 430. In his youth he applied to poetry and painting; both which pursuits he relinquished to become a disciple of Socrates. During the imprisonment of his master, Plato attended him, and committed to writing his last discourses upon the immortality of the Soul. He then retired to Megara; after which he extended his travels to Magna Græcia and Egypt. On his return to Athens, he formed his school in a grove, called the Academy, over the door of which seminary was this inscription, "Let no one ignorant of geometry enter here." He was soon attended by a crowd of hearers of every description, and among other illustrious names to be ranked among his disciples, are those of Dion, Aristotle, Hyperides, Lycurgus, Demosthenes, and Isocrates. The ancients thought more highly of him than of all their philosophers, and always called him the Divine Plato. Tully, whose regard and veneration for him were boundless, observes that he was justly called by Panætius, the divine, the most wise, the most sacred, the Homer of philosophers; and made him so implicitly his guide in wisdom and philosophy, as to declare, that he had rather err with Plato, than be right with any one else. He thrice visited the court of Sicily: once invited by the elder Dionysius, and twice by the younger. The former he so much offended, that the tyrant caused him to be seized on his passage home, and sold for a slave; and the philosopher was indebted for his liberation to Anicetus of Cyrene. On his return to Athens, Plato resumed his school, and no persuasion could afterwards induce him to quit his peaceful retirement. At his death, which happened in in his 79th year, B.C. 348, statues and altars were erected to his memory; and the day of his birth was long celebrated as a festival.

PLATOFF, Count, a celebrated hetman of the Cossacks, was born in the southern part of Russia, about 1763. He entered young into the military service, distinguished himself against the Turks in Moldavia, and was made a general of cavalry. When the French invaded Russia, in 1812, Platoff, with twenty regiments of Cossacks, harassed them in their flight, and contributed greatly to the advantages gained over them. He came with the emperor Alexander to England, and, at London, was the object of popular admiration. He retired to the river Don, and died in 1818.

PLAUTUS, MARCUS ACCIUS, a comic writer of ancient Rome, who acquired the surname of Plautus from the ill shape of his feet. He died B.C. 184.

PLAYFORD, JOHN, a writer on music, was born in 1613, and published "An Introduction to the Skill of Music," often reprinted; "Court Ayres;" and "Psalms and Hymns in solemn Music."—His son, HENRY PLAYFORD, was the publisher of "Orpheus Britannicus."

PLAYFAIR, JOHN, an eminent mathematician and natural philosopher, was born at Bervie, near Dundee, of which parish his father was minister, in 1749. He received his education at St. Andrew's; and, in 1772, succeeded to his father's living; but resigned it some years afterwards, and went to Edinburgh, where he became professor of mathematics. In his latter years he applied to the study of geology, which he pursued with indefatigable ardour; and, in 1816, undertook a journey to the Alps, for the purpose of making observations on those mountains. Among his works are, "Elements of Geometry;" "Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory of the Earth;" "System of Geography," 5 vols. 4to.; and "Outlines of Philosophy." Died, 1819.

PLAYFAIR, WILLIAM, brother of the preceding, born in 1759, was an ingenious projector and author. After serving an apprenticeship to a millwright, he was engaged as a draughtsman at Boulton and Watt's establishment, Soho, Birmingham. On coming to London, he obtained patents for various inventions, and engaged in many speculations; became a fertile writer on politics and other subjects; and died in 1623. His most important publications are, "A Commercial and Political Atlas;" "An Inquiry into the Decline and Fall of Nations;" "France as it is;" "History of Jacobinism;" and "British Family Antiquity."

PLINIUS, SECUNDUS CAIUS, OF PLINY THE ELDER, one of the most celebrated writers of ancient Rome, was born A.D. 23, at Verona, or, as some say, at Como; served in the army in Germany; afterwards became an advocate; and was ultimately procurator in Spain and Africa. As an inquirer into the works of nature he was indefatigable; and he lost his life by his thirst for knowledge. Being at Misenum with a fleet which he commanded, on the 24th of August, A.D. 79, his sister desired him to observe a remarkable cloud that had just appeared. Pliny, discovering that it proceeded from Mount Vesuvius, ordered his galleys to sea, to assist the inhabitants on the coast, while he himself steered as near as possible to the foot of the mountain, which now sent forth vast quantities of burning rock and lava. Pliny and his companions landed at Stabiae, but were soon obliged to leave the town for the fields, where the danger was equally great, from the shower of fire which fell upon them. In this state they made the best of their way to the shore, but Pliny, who was very corpulent, fell down dead, suffocated by the noxious vapours. The eruption which caused his death appears to have been that in which the cities of Herculaneum and Pompei were destroyed, in the first year of the emperor Titus. He wrote the "History of his own Time," in 31 books, which is lost, and his "Natural History," in 37 books, one of the most precious monuments of antiquity extant.

PLINIUS, CÆCILIUS SECUNDUS CAIUS, OR PLINY THE YOUNGER, nephew of the preceding, was born A.D. 62, at Como. He studied under Virgilinus and Quintilian; and in his eighteenth year began to plead in the forum. Soon after this he went as tribune to Syria; from whence he returned, when he had made one or two campaigns, and settled at Rome. He was promoted to the consular dignity, by Trajan, in praise of whom he pronounced a famous oration, which is extant. He was next chosen augur; and afterwards made pro-consul of Bithynia, from whence he wrote to Trajan a curious account of the Christians, and their manner of worship. The "Epistles of Pliny" are elegant specimens of letter-writing, and very instructive; they have been translated into English by Lord Orrery and Mr. Melmoth.

PLOT, ROBERT, a naturalist, was born in 1640, at Borden, in Kent; was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he graduated as B.L.D.; became one of the secretaries of the royal society; royal historiographer, archivist of the Herald's office, &c.; and died in 1696. His chief works are, "The Natural Histories of Oxfordshire and Staffordshire."

PLOTINUS, a Platonic philosopher, was born in 203, at Lycopolis, in Egypt; and accompanied the emperor Gordian in his expedition against the Parthians, in order to obtain a knowledge of Indian and Persian philosophy. He afterwards resided at Rome; and died in 270.

PLOWDEN, EDMUND, an eminent lawyer, was born in Shropshire, in 1517, and died in 1584. His "Commentaries and Reports" are greatly esteemed.

PLOWDEN, CHARLES, a Jesuit, born in England, in 1743, but educated at Rome, where he entered into the society in 1579. On his return to his own country after the suppression of his order in 1773, he was one of the most zealous advocates for their re-uniting in England. He afterwards became president of the Catholic college of Stonyhurst, in Lancashire; and died in 1821.

PLOWDEN, FRANCIS, an historian and miscellaneous writer, was a native of Ireland, and by profession a barrister and conveyancer. He was the author of "Jura Anglorum;" "Church and State;" "A Treatise upon the Law of Usury and Annuities;" and "The History of Ireland." In consequence of a verdict obtained against him for a libel in the latter work, with 5000*l.* damages, he retired to France, where he afterwards resided; and died, at an advanced age, in 1839.

PLUCHE, NOËL ASTOIXE, a learned French writer, born at Rheims, in 1696, in the college of which city he was professor of rhetoric. He was afterwards appointed president of the college of Laon; but was removed from his office in consequence of his opposition to the bull Unigenitus; and died in 1761. His "Histoire du Ciel," and "Spectacle de la Nature," both of which were translated into English, were at one time very popular.

PLUKENET, LEONARD, an eminent English botanist, was born in 1642. He practised as an apothecary in Westminster, and raised a botanic garden there. After the greater part of his life passed in struggles against adversity, he was appointed superintendent of the garden at Hampton-court, and royal professor of botany. He died about 1708. His "Phytographia" is an honourable proof of his abilities. He also published "Almagestum Botanicum," "Almagesti Botanici Mantissa," and "Amalthæum Botanicum."

PLUMIER, CHARLES, an eminent French botanist, was born at Marseilles, in 1646. Louis XIV. sent him to America to collect plants useful in medicine, and he made three voyages for that purpose. At the desire of Fagon, he undertook a fourth voyage; but died as he was about to embark, near Cadix, in 1706.

PLUMPTRE, JAMES, a clergyman and miscellaneous writer, was the son of Dr. Plumtre, president of Queen's college, Cambridge, where he entered as a student in 1787. At the commencement of his career he wrote several dramatic pieces, viz. "The Coventry Act," a comedy; "Osway," a tragedy; and several others; besides "Observations on Hamlet;" "The English Drama Purified;" and "Four Discourses on Subjects relating to the Amusements of the Stage." His other works consist principally of "Sermons" preached on particular occasions, several of which are of a very popular character. He was also the author of "Letters to Dr. Aikin, on his Volume of Vocal Poetry," Died, 1832.

PLUTARCH, a celebrated Greek philosopher and historian, was a native of Cheronea, in Boeotia. On visiting Rome, he was received with flattering marks of distinction by Trajan, who raised him to the consular dignity, and appointed him governor of Illyria. After the death of his patron, Plutarch returned to Cheronea, where he died at an advanced age, A. D. 150. The most celebrated of his works are, his "Lives of Illustrious Men," and his "Morals."

PLUVINEL, ANTHONY, a native of Dauphiny, who was master of the horse to Henry IV., by whom he was sent ambassador to Holland. He was the first in France that opened a school for riding, on which subject he wrote a work, called "L'Art de monter à Cheval." Died, 1620.

POCOCK, DR. EDWARD, a most learned English critic and commentator, and famous particularly for his great skill in Oriental languages, was born at Oxford, in 1604; received his education at Magdalen and Corpus Christi colleges; twice visited the Levant, for the purpose of collecting ancient manuscripts and coins; was afterwards Hebrew professor at Oxford, rector of Christrey, and canon of Christchurch; and died in 1691. Among his works are, "Specimen Historiæ Arabum;" "Albafaragius Historia Dynastiarum;" "Commentaries on the Minor Prophets," &c. Died, 1691.

POCOCK, ISAAC, an artist and dramatist, was born at Bristol, in 1782. His father had distinguished himself as a marine painter; and Isaac appearing to have the same genius for the art, was placed first with Romney, and afterwards studied under Sir William Beechey. He gained the first prize given by the British Institution, by the production of his historical picture of the murder of Thomas à Becket. He afterwards painted other pictures, but becoming independent, he gradually relaxed in the prosecution of that profession, and retired to Maidenhead, where he occasionally used both his pencil and pen, and produced many dramatic pieces, the greater part of which were successful. Here he was nominated to the commission of the peace and deputy-lieutenant of the county of Berks. He died after the illness of a few hours only, August 23, 1835. He was the author of about forty melo-dramas, farces, and operatic pieces; among which were "The Miller and his Men," "Hit or Miss," "John of Paris," "Robinson Crusoe," "Montrose," &c. &c.

POCOCKE, RICHARD, a learned palæontologist and traveller, was born at Southampton, in 1704; received his education at the free-school there, of which his father was master, and at Corpus Christi college, Oxford; travelled in the East from 1737 to 1742; was, successively, precentor of Waterford, archdeacon of St. Patrick's, bishop of Osnaburg, and of Meath; and died in 1765. His POGGIO BRACCIOLINI, an Italian writer of the 15th century, who contributed greatly to the revival of classical literature in Europe, was born at Terranova, in Tuscany; was educated at Florence; and held the office of apostolical secretary to no less than eight popes. He devoted much of his time in the search after manuscripts; and to him the world is indebted for Quintilian; the orations of Cicero; Lucretius; part of Plautus; and other remains of antiquity. He was a man of eminent talent; but his morals and disposition were most reprehensible. His chief works are, a "History of Florence;" "Dialogues on Nobility;" and "Funeral Orations." Died, 1480.

POISSON, RAIMOND, a French actor and dramatist of the 17th century, who obtained great celebrity in low comedy. He wrote a number of theatrical pieces; and died in 1690.—His son, PAUL POISSON, was eminent as a comic actor. Died, 1735.—The two sons of Paul, PHILIP and ARNOULT DE ROINVILLE, were also distinguished for their theatrical talents: the former was the author of ten comedies, and was a good tragic performer; while the latter fully supported the reputation of his family, as a comic actor. He died in 1753.

POISSONNIER, PETER ISAAC, an eminent physician, was born at Dijon, in 1720. He became professor of medicine in the college de France, and was the first who gave chemical lectures at Paris. In 1758, being first physician to the French army, he went to Russia, to attend the empress Elizabeth in her illness. In 1764 he was appointed inspector-general of physic in the ports and colonies; and died in 1798. M. Poissonnier wrote several practical works; but he is chiefly known by his method of procuring fresh water from that of the sea, for which he received a pension of 12,000 livres.

POIVRE, N., a French naturalist, was born at Lyons, in 1719. He was appointed intendant of the Isles of France and Bourbon, where he introduced the bread-fruit tree, and other valuable plants. Died, 1796.

POLE, REGINALD, cardinal, an eminent statesman, and archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of queen Mary, was descended from the blood-royal of England, and born at Stourton castle, in Staffordshire, in 1500. He was educated at Sheen monastery, and Magdalen college, Oxford; and after obtaining preferment in the church, went to Italy, where he long resided. On his return to England he opposed the divorce of Henry VIII. from Catherine of Arragon, in such terms, that the king drove him from his presence, and never saw him more. He again left England, was made a cardinal, and very nearly obtained the popedom on the death of Paul III. When Mary ascended the throne, Paul returned to England as legate, in which capacity he absolved the parliament from the sin of heresy, and reconciled the nation to the holy see. The very day after the burning of Cranmer, the cardinal was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury; soon after which he was elected chancellor of both universities; and he survived the queen but one day, Nov. 15, 1558.

POLEMBERG, CORNELIUS, a painter, was born at Utrecht, in 1586. He was a disciple of Abraham Bloemart, and completed his studies at Rome. On his return he received much encouragement from Rubens; and Charles I. invited him to England, where he painted a number of beautiful landscapes, principally of a small size, and which are now rare.

POLEMON, a Greek philosopher, was born at Eta. In his youth he led a very dissipated life; but, by hearing Xenocrates discourse on the miseries of intemperance, he became reformed, and succeeded that philosopher in his school.—There was also a rhetorician of this name, who lived in the reign of Trajan.

POLIGNAC, MELCHIOR DE, a French cardinal and statesman, was born in 1611, at Puy en Velay, in Languedoc. He was employed as a negotiator at Rome, in Poland, and in Holland, and acquitted himself so well that he was rewarded with the purple. During the regency he was banished to his abbey of Anchin; but afterwards he was recalled, and appointed agent for French affairs at Rome. In 1726 he was made archbishop of Auch; and died in 1741. He wrote a Latin poem, entitled "Anti-Lucretius;" which has often been reprinted, and was translated into English by the father of the late Mr. Canning.

POLITIAN, ANGELO, an eminent Italian scholar, was born in 1454, at Monte Pulciano, in the Florentine territories, whence he derived the appellation by which he is more usually known than by that of Cicis, his family name. He assumed the ecclesiastical habit, and acquired by his accomplishments the favour of Lorenzo the Magnificent, who made him tutor to his children, and presented him with a canonry in the cathedral of Florence, which he held with the professorship of the Greek and Latin languages. Among the most esteemed of his writings are "A Collection of Greek Epigrams;" the "History of the Conspiracy of the Pazzi;" the drama of "Orpheus;" and a Latin version of Herodian. Died, 1494.

POLLEXFEN, SIR HENRY, an eminent English judge, who in 1688 was one of the counsel for the seven bishops. After the Revolution he was knighted, and made chief justice of the Common Pleas. Died, 1692.

POLI, G. SAVERIO, an eminent naturalist, was born at Molfetta, in Italy, in 1746, and studied in the university of Padua. He was the friend of Morgagni, Fraccolati, Poleni, and Valscchi; and became director of the military academy of Naples, where he died in 1825. He was the author of a very popular "System of Natural Philosophy," and also of a work on "Tectonics."

POLLIO, CAIUS ASINIUS, a celebrated Roman, who was much esteemed by Augustus, and gained a great reputation by his military exploits, but more by his literary connexions. He filled the office of consul B.C. 40; and was the intimate friend of Horace and Virgil. He was the author of tragedies, orations, and a history, which are lost. Died, aged 80, B.C. 4.

POLLOCK, ROBERT, a Scotch clergyman, and writer of sacred poetry, was born in 1779, at Eaglesham, in Renfrewshire. Being intended for the church, he was sent to the university of Glasgow to study theology; but his health became so much impaired by study, that he had scarcely entered on his ministry before he found it necessary to quit the north with a view to a residence in Italy, in order to try the effect of change of climate. He left Scotland in August, 1827, but he had only proceeded to Southampton, when his malady increased to such a degree as precluded all hope of recovery, and he died there in the following month. His principal production is entitled "The Course of Time," a poem in ten books. He also wrote "The Persecuted Family," a narrative of the sufferings of the Presbyterians in the reign of Charles II.; and "Ralph Gemmel," a tale for youth.

POLLUX, JULIUS, was born in Egypt in 180; he taught rhetoric at Athens, and was appointed preceptor to the emperor Commodus, for whose use he drew up an "Onomasticon, or Greek Vocabulary." Died, 238.

POLO, MARCO, a celebrated traveller of the 13th century, was the son of a Venetian merchant, who had penetrated to the court of Kublai, the great khan of the Tartars. This prince being highly entertained with their account of Europe, made them his ambassadors to the pope; on which they travelled back to Rome, and, with two missionaries, once more visited Tartary, accompanied by the young Marco, who became a great favourite with the khan. Having acquired the different dialects of Tartary, he was employed on various embassies; and, after a residence of seventeen years, all the three Venetians returned to their own country in 1295, with immense wealth. Marco afterwards served his country at sea against the Genoese, and, being taken prisoner, remained many years in confinement, the tedium of which he beguiled by composing the history of his "Travels." Marco Polo relates many things which appear highly incredible, but the greater part of his narrative has been verified by succeeding travellers.

POLYÆNUS, a Greek author in the second century, who wrote eight books of the "Stratagems of Illustrious Generals." He appears to have been a Macedonian, and, after serving in the army, he became a statesman under Antoninus and Verus.

POLYBIUS, a celebrated Greek historian, son of Lycortas, general of the Achæans, was born in Arcadia, B.C. 203. He was formed for public business by the precepts and example of Philopomen, and at the funeral of that general he bore the urn which contained his ashes. Being sent to Rome as one of the hostages demanded of the Achæans, his residence at the capital of the world was of great importance to Polybius, who, on his return to Greece, was employed in public affairs by several states. He wrote a "Universal History," in forty books, of which we have only five complete, and an abridgment of twelve others.

POLYCARP, St., a Christian father and martyr, who, according to tradition, was a disciple of the apostle John, and by him appointed bishop of Smyrna. He made many converts, and violently opposed the heresies of Marcion and Valentinus; but during the persecution of the Christians under Marcus Aurelius, he suffered martyrdom with the most heroic fortitude, A.D. 109. His "Epistle to the Philippians" is the only one of his pieces that has been preserved.

POLYCLETUS, a famous sculptor, was born at Sicyon, and flourished about the year B.C. 430. He is considered to have attained perfection in single figures; and a statue of a boy, executed by him, was sold for one hundred talents, equivalent to 20,000*l*.

POLYGNOTUS, a painter of Thasos, about 422 B.C. He gained celebrity by a series of pictures on the war of Troy, for which he refused the presents offered him by the states of Greece; he also painted the temple of Delphi, and part of the Pæcile at Athens gratuitously, for which it was decreed that he should be supported at the public expence.

POMBAL, SEBASTIAN JOSEPH CARVALHO MELHO, marquis of, a Portuguese statesman, was born at Soure, in 1699. After having been ambassador to London and Vienna, he was, in 1750, appointed secretary of state for foreign affairs, and, in 1756, prime minister. He introduced many reforms and changes in the government; but as his measures were frequently severe and arbitrary, he raised up many enemies, and on the death of the king, in 1777, he was disgraced, and exiled to his estates, where he died in 1782.

POMFRET, JOHN, an English poet, was born at Luton, in Bedfordshire, in 1687; was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge; and obtained the living of Malden. He was the author of "The Choice," a poem which has ever been popular; but owing to an equivocal expression therein, Dr. Compton, bishop of London, thought him unfit for the clerical office, and refused to induct him to another and more considerable benefice. The prelate was, however, soon after convinced of his mistake; but in the meantime Pomfret, who had been detained in London, caught the small-pox, and died of it in 1708.

POMPADOUR, JEANNE ANTOINETTE POISSON, marchioness de, the mistress of Louis XV., in whose affections she succeeded madame de Chateauroux, was the daughter of a financier, and born in 1720. At the age of twenty-one she was married to M. d'Etioles; first attracted the king's notice while he was hunting in the forest of Senart; appeared at court in 1745, under the title of marchioness of Pompadour; and died in 1764, aged 44 years. She certainly used her influence with the king in promoting the progress of the fine arts, but her cupidity and extravagance were unbounded; and many of the evils which oppressed France in the succeeding reign have been attributed to the power she possessed of filling the most important offices of the state with her favourites, whose measures were generally inglorious, both at home and abroad.

POMPEY, surnamed the Great, or CNEIUS POMPEIUS MAGNUS, was of a noble family, and born B.C. 105. He studied the art of war under his father, and, when he was only twenty-three, raised three legions, with which he joined Sylla, whose opponents he drove out of Sicily and Africa. That commander recalled him to Rome, and gave him the name of Magnus. Pompey also obtained the honours of a triumph, and was chosen consul; in which office he restored the tribunes, and extended the Roman empire beyond Asia Minor. For these services he received another triumph, soon after which he formed the first triumvirate with Caesar and Crassus; but though he married the daughter of Caesar, a civil war broke out between them, in which Pompey was utterly defeated, at Pharsalia. He then fled to Egypt, and was there assassinated, by order of the ministers of Ptolemy, king of that country, B.C. 48.

POMPIGNAN, JOHN JAMES LE FRANCH, marquis of, was born at Montauban, in 1709. He gained a great reputation by his tragedy of "Dido," acted in 1734. His works, which have been published in 6 vols. 8vo., consist of dramatic pieces, sacred odes, moral discourses, a translation of the Georgics, &c. Died, 1764.

POMPONIUS LÆTUS, JULIUS, sometimes styled Peter of Calabria, a learned antiquary of the 15th century, was professor of rhetoric at Rome, and the founder of an academy, which was suppressed by Paul II., and many of the members imprisoned and put to the torture; but Sextus IV. released them, and restored Pomponius to his professorship. Died, 1498.

POND, JOHN, F.R.S., an eminent English astronomer, who for a period of twenty-five years held the important office of astronomer-royal, died at his house, in Greenwich, in September, 1836; and his remains were interred in the same tomb, at Lee, that for ninety-three years had given shelter to the ashes of his celebrated predecessor, Dr. Edmund Halley. According to the testimony of Sir Humphrey Davy, "the enthusiasm with which he pursued his favourite science, and the sacrifices of time, health, and money, that he made in consequence, were great indeed." As a practical astronomer, he had scarcely any equal; his talent for taking observations was quite unique; and to his zeal our national observatory is indebted for many of the new instruments which have, confessedly, rendered it so pre-eminent and complete.

PONIATOWSKI, STANISLAUS AUGUSTUS, the last king of Poland, was the son of a private gentleman of Lithuania, and was born in 1732. Having been fortunate enough to please the grand duchess, afterwards Catharine II., he was elected king in 1764. At the commencement of his reign he gave many proofs of his moderation and love of justice; but his attempts to introduce some modifications into the Polish constitution, raised a powerful party against him. The protestants, who were excluded from a place in the diet and from the right of votes, claimed the restoration of the treaty of Olivia, made in 1660. The ministers of Russia, England, and Prussia, favoured their claim, and Stanislaus was also inclined to grant their request; but the catholic bishops protested against the measure, as favouring the enemies of the state. Russian troops soon after appeared at the gates of Warsaw, when the catholics formed themselves into an army, to which they gave the name of "confederates." Pulaski, one of their chiefs, proposed carrying off the king; for which purpose he, with two other chiefs, and forty dragoons, disguised as peasants, laid wait for him near the town. When the royal carriage approached, they seized the king, and then placed him on one of their horses. The night was dark, but they forced the animals forward until they were exhausted; they then walked, dragging Stanislaus with them; but at dawn of day, finding they had missed the way, and that they were only a short distance from the city, all, except Kosinski, fled. Struck with remorse, he implored the king's pardon, which the monarch readily granted, and, on his return to his palace, settled a pension on the penitent chief. But Stanislaus still continued to be afflicted by the divisions of his people. In 1787 the empress Catharine visited the Crimea, and the king obtained from her a promise of security for his kingdom; the emperor Joseph II. also made him a like solemn promise. Nevertheless, in 1792 the Russians and the Prussians invaded Poland, and in defiance of the efforts of the brave Kosciusko, divided the unhappy kingdom between them, and Stanislaus was compelled to sign his abdication. He then retired to St. Petersburg, and lived as a private individual until his death, in 1796.

PONIATOWSKI, Prince JOSEPH, an illustrious Polish general, was the nephew of the preceding, and born at Warsaw, in 1763. At the age of sixteen he entered into the service of Joseph II. of Austria, but quitted it for the purpose of aiding his country, the moment that he saw there were hopes entertained of her throwing off a foreign yoke. He served with courage against the Russians, under Kosciusko, who gave him the command of a division, at the head of which he distinguished himself at the two sieges of Warsaw. After the surrender of the city, he went to Vienna, and, rejecting the offers of Catharine and Paul, lived in retirement, on his return to Poland, at his estates near Warsaw. The creation of the duchy of Warsaw rekindled the hopes of the Polish patriots, and Poniatowski accepted the place of minister of war in the new state. In 1806, he commanded the Polish army against the superior Austrian force, which was sent to occupy the duchy; compelled it to retire, rather by skillful manoeuvres than by force of arms; and penetrated into Galicia. In the war of 1812, against Russia, he was again at the head of the Polish forces, and distinguished himself in all the principal affairs of this chequered campaign. After the battle of Leipzig, during which Napoleon created him marshal of France, he was ordered to cover the retreat of the French army. The enemy were already in possession of the suburbs of Leipzig, and had thrown light troops over the Elster, when the prince arrived, with a few followers, at the river, the bridge over which had been blown up by the French. The brave Polisher, already wounded, plunged, with his horse, into the stream, and was drowned, Oct. 19, 1814. His body was found on the 21th, and, having been embalmed, was buried at Warsaw, with all the honours of his rank, by order of the emperor Alexander.

PONSONBY, SIR FREDERIC CAVENDISH, K.C.B., a distinguished cavalry officer, and major-general in the British army, was the second son of the earl of Bessborough, and born in 1743. He was appointed to a cornetcy in the 10th dragoons in 1800, and after passing through the intermediate grades of rank, obtained a majority in the 23d light dragoons in 1807. During the Peninsular war this gallant soldier had frequent opportunities of distinguishing himself; and was regarded as the beau idéal of a cavalry officer. At Talavera, Barrosa, Vimiera, Salamanca, and Vittoria, he performed some of the most brilliant exploits recorded in that fierce and enterprising era of the war; and during the whole of the retrograde movement of the army from the Douro, a day seldom passed without his being more or less engaged with the enemy's advance. But we must omit the details of his valuable operations in the Peninsula, to describe the termination of his splendid career on the field of Waterloo. In the absence of his commanding officer, general Vandeleur, who had a few minutes before led forward the 15th light dragoons, he observed a French column rapidly advancing into the small valley which lay between the two armies. There was not a moment to lose: Col. Ponsonby, calculating the column at about one thousand, exclaimed, "They must not be allowed to come further," and with his well-known "Come on, 15th!" dashed down the field, followed by his men. At the very moment when they had driven their opponents back into the enemy's lines, and the colonel was anxious to draw off his comrades, who were now fighting at fearful odds, he received a cut on his right arm, which caused his sword to drop, and immediately afterwards he received another on his left, which he raised to protect his head. By the latter he lost the command of his horse, which galloped forward, and Col. Ponsonby, unable to defend himself, received a blow from a sword on his head, which brought him senseless to the ground. There he lay, exposed on the field, during the whole of the ensuing night. After being wantonly pierced through the back by a lancer, plundered by a French dragoon, rode over by two squadrons of Prussian cavalry, and encumbered for some hours by a dying soldier lying across his legs, he was at length accosted by an English soldier, whom he persuaded to stay by him until morning, when a cart conveyed him to the village of Waterloo. He had received seven wounds; but by constant attention he at length recovered! Colonel Ponsonby was one of the brightest ornaments of the army, and a universal favourite. To the most chivalrous bravery he united military talents of no ordinary cast, which were guided by a remarkable calmness of judgment and coolness of decision. No lesson of experience was ever lost upon him; and his authority in matters of his profession, particularly the cavalry service, was regarded with general respect. He died Jan. 11, 1807; being at the time a major-general in the army, K.C.B., and colonel of the royal dragoons; besides enjoying the honour of four foreign orders of knighthood. It is somewhat remarkable that his cousin, Sir William Ponsonby, was slain in this memorable battle.

PONTANUS, JOHN JOVIAN, a learned Italian, born at Cerreto, in Umbria, in 1476, was preceptor, and afterwards secretary, to Alphonso the younger, king of Arragon.

PONTANUS, JOHN ISAAC, historiographer to the king of Denmark and the province of Guelderland, was born in 1571, and died in 1640. He wrote several historical and topographical works.

PONTAULT, SEBASTIAN BRAULIEU DE, a French engineer. At the age of fifteen he was appointed, for his gallant conduct, commissary of artillery. He afterwards distinguished himself in several battles and sieges, until the loss of an arm, and other wounds, obliged him to retire from the service. He died in 1674. His principal work is entitled "Les Glorieuses Conquêtes de Louis le Grand."

PONTOPPIDAN, ERIC, a Danish prelate, distinguished as a theological and historical writer, was born at Aarhus, in 1606; became bishop of Bergen in 1746; and died in 1764. His principal works are, "Annals of the Danish Church;" and the "Natural History of Norway."

POOL, MATTHEW, a nonconformist minister, was born at York, in 1624. He displayed so much zeal against popery, that, according to the deposition of Titus Oates, his name was among those intended to be taken off in the popish plot. On this he went to Amsterdam, where he died in 1679. Besides "Sermons," he wrote "Annotations on the Bible;" but his greatest work was the "Synopsis Criticorum," in 6 vols.

POPE, SIR THOMAS, a statesman, and a patron of learning, was born at Dedding, in Oxfordshire, in 1508; was educated at Eton; and after studying at Gray's Inn, was called to the bar. He was knighted in 1540, and held various important offices under Henry VIII. and Mary. He was the intimate friend of Sir Thomas More, to whom, by order of the king, he communicated the sad tidings of his intended execution. In 1554 he founded Trinity college, Oxford; and died in 1558.

POPE, ALEXANDER, a celebrated poet, was born in 1688, in Lombard-street, London, where his father had carried on an extensive business as a linen draper, and amassed a considerable fortune. His parents being of the Romish persuasion, he was placed at eight years of age under one Taverner, a priest, who taught him the rudiments of Latin and Greek. At the age of twelve he retired with his parents to Binfield, in Windsor Forest, where his father had purchased a small estate. Here he wrote his "Ode on Solitude," which appears as the first fruits of his poetic genius. It was here also that he first met with the works of Waller, Spenser, and Dryden; but on perusing Dryden he abandoned the rest and studied him as his model. At the age of sixteen he wrote his "Pastorals," which procured him the friendship of the principal wits of the time. His next performance was the "Essay on Criticism," published in 1711. The "Messiah" appeared first in the Spectator, and this was followed by his "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day." About this period also he produced the "Rape of the Lock," occasioned by Lord Petre's cutting off a ringlet of Mrs. Arabella Fermor's hair. He next brought out his "Epistle from Eloisa to Abelard," "The Temple of Fame," and "Windsor Forest." Pope now undertook his translation of the "Iliad," which he published by subscription, and cleared by it above five thousand pounds, part of which he laid out in the purchase of a house at Twickenham, whither he removed in 1715. After completing the Iliad, he undertook the "Odyssey," for which also he experienced a liberal subscription. He was, however, materially assisted in these works by the learning and abilities of others, particularly Broome, Fenton, and Parnell. The reputation he had acquired by the success, as well as the merit of his works, procured him numerous enemies among writers of the minor class, from whom he experienced frequent spleenetic attacks. Perhaps it would have been more to his honour had he taken no notice of them; but in 1727 he vented his resentment in a mock heroic, entitled "The Dunciad," in which he took more than warrantable revenge, and what was worse, exposed to ridicule many ingenious and respectable persons who had given him no offence. In 1729, by the advice of Lord Bolingbroke, he turned his pen to a moral and philosophical subject; the result was his "Essay on Man," an ethical poem, addressed to that statesman, which attracted universal admiration. to indicate a commencing decline; and while he was engaged in preparing a complete edition of his works, he expired, May 30, 1744, aged 56.

POPHAM, Sir JOHN, an eminent judge, was born in Somersetshire, in 1531. After serving the offices of attorney and solicitor-general, he was appointed, in 1581, chief justice of the king's bench. He died in 1607. His "Reports and Cases," in folio, show his abilities to great advantage.

POPHAM, Sir HOME RHOES, a naval commander, was born in Ireland, in 1762. He served as a lieutenant in the American war; and rose to the rank of post-captain soon after the commencement of the war with France, having rendered essential service to the duke of York in Holland. He was next employed in the Baltic, and, in 1800, appointed to a command in the East Indies. In 1803 he entered the Red Sea, and settled advantageous terms of commerce for the English merchants. He was afterwards engaged in an expedition against Buenos Ayres, for which, as he was charged with acting without sufficient authority, he was tried by a court-martial, and reprimanded. He finally obtained the situation of commander-in-chief on the Jamaica station; and had but just returned to England in 1820, when he died.

PORDENONE (so called from his birth-place, his true name being Giovanni Antonio Licinio) a painter of the Venetian school, and rival of Titian, was born in 1484. He executed many great works for Mantua, Genoa, and Venice; and died at Ferrara, in 1540.

POREE, CHARLES, a Jesuit, was born near Caen, in Normandy, in 1675. After acquiring a great reputation as a teacher in his native province, he became professor of rhetoric in the college of Louis the Great, at Paris, where he died in 1741.

PORLIER, JUAN DIAZ, surnamed 'El Marquésito, a Spanish patriot and general, was born, about 1775, at Carthagena, in South America, where his father held a high public situation. He first entered the navy, and served as a midshipman at the battle of Trafalgar; but when the cry of independence spread through the Peninsula in 1808, he raised a guerilla corps, of which he became the leader, and distinguished himself in a series of brilliant actions, and effected the celebrated retreat from Santander, closely pursued by a corps four times more numerous than his own. The regency then appointed him captain-general of Asturias, in which station he remained till the restoration of Ferdinand the VIIth. Having unsuccessfully attempted to restore the constitution of the Cortes in 1815, he was delivered over to the military authorities at Coruana, condemned, and executed.

PORPHYRY, or PORPHYRIUS, a philosopher, whose original name was Malchus, was born at Tyre, in 233; studied under Origen and Longinus; afterwards became a disciple of Plotinus, whose life he wrote; and died in 304. His works against the Christians, to the number of fifteen, are all lost; but his "Life of Pythagoras;" "A Treatise on Abstinence and Animal Food;" and "Questions on Homer," are extant.

PORPORATE, CHARLES, a celebrated Italian engraver, born in 1741, died in 1818. Among his chief-d'œuvres, are the "Little Girl and the Dog;" "Leda at the Bath;" "Susannah;" and "Eaone and Paris." He was also a portrait-painter; and his portraits are admired for their colouring and truth.

PORSON, RICHARD, an eminent critic, and professor of Greek in the university of Cambridge, was born in 1759, at East Ruston, in Norfolk, where he was first instructed by his father, who was the parish clerk, and afterwards by Mr. Norris, the vicar. His proficiency in the classics was so great, that Mr. Norris sent him to Eton in 1774, and in 1777 he went to Trinity-college, Cambridge, where, in 1781, he was elected to a fellowship. In 1785 he took his master's degree, but having an objection to the church, he was under the necessity of resigning his fellowship, and, in 1793, was elected Greek professor. In 1797 he published the "Hecuba" of Euripides, which was followed by the "Orestes," the "Phænissæ," and "Medea." His last literary work was an edition of Æschylus, 2 vols. He enjoyed the reputation of being one of the best Greek scholars and critics of the age in England, notwithstanding which, he experienced little patronage—a circumstance partly attributable to his intemperate habits. Towards the latter part of his life, he was appointed librarian to the London Institution, with a salary of 300*l.* a-year; and it was there he died, in 1808. After his death were published his "Adversaria, or Notes and Emendations of the Greek Poets," and his "Tracts and Miscellanies."

PORTA, BACCIO DELLA, a painter of Florence, who belonged to the order of Dominicans, and is sometimes called Fra Bartolomeo, or Il Frate. He was intimate with Raphael, and, it is said, the two artists benefited by reciprocal instruction. Died, 1517.

PORTA, GIOVANNI BATTISTA DELLA, a natural philosopher and mathematician, was born at Naples, in 1540. He devoted a great part of his life to the sciences, established two academies for its promotion, and was the inventor of the camera obscura. He wrote treatises on natural history, optics, hydraulics, physiognomy, and agriculture; and also produced nearly twenty dramatic pieces.

POTALIS, JEAN ETIENNE MARIE, a French statesman, was born at Beauvais, in Provence, in 1746; and was at the commencement of the Revolution one of the most distinguished advocates of the parliament of Aix. During the tyranny of Robespierre he was imprisoned, but subsequently became president of the Council of Ancients. He was proscribed by the Directory, in 1807, for the moderation of his principles, and fled to Holstein; but when Buonaparte became first consul, Portalis was recalled, and nominated minister for religious affairs, and grand cordon of the legion of honour. Died, 1807.

PORTER, ANNA MARIA, younger sister of Miss Jane Porter, the authoress of "Thaddeus of Warsaw," &c., and of Sir R. K. Porter, was the daughter of an officer in the army, who died a few months after her birth. With her orphan family, Mrs. Porter retired to Edinburgh, where Anna Maria's early talents, cherished by an enthusiastic love for the beautiful in nature and the pure in morals, quickly developed themselves. After a time they settled in the neighbourhood of London; the sisters distinguishing themselves in the literary world, while their private lives were models for imitation. Several admirable novels were produced by Miss A. M. Porter, besides poems, in all of which the inculcation of virtuous and heroic sentiments is steadily kept in view. Among her novels may be mentioned, "The Hungarian Brothers;" "Don Sebastian;" "Tales round a Winter's Hearth;" "The Recluse of Norway;" "The Knight of St. John;" "The Barony," &c. Died, 1832.

PORTEUS, BEILBY, an eminent English prelate, was born at York, in 1731, and entered as a sizar at Christ's college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. He was, successively, chaplain to archbishop Secker, rector of Hinton, prebendary of Peterborough, rector of Lambeth, King's chaplain, and master of St. Cross Hospital, near Winchester. In 1776 he was raised to the see of Chester, at the express instance of queen Charlotte, and in 1787 he was translated to the bishopric of London, over which diocese he continued to preside till his death in 1808. Bishop Porteus was a man of deep erudition and considerable ability. Among his works are, a "Life of Archbishop Secker;" "Sermons;" and a Sermonian prize poem on "Death." It is said that he also assisted Hannah More in the composition of her religious novel, "Celebs in Search of a Wife."

POSSEVIN, ANTHONY, a learned Jesuit, was born at Mantua, in 1534. Pope Gregory XIII. employed him in several embassies; but having given offence to the court of Spain, he was banished the city of Rome, and died at Ferrara, in 1611.

POSSIDONIUS, a celebrated architect, who lived in the fourth century, B.C. was a native of Rhodes, and was engineer to Alexander the Great, whom he accompanied in his various expeditions. Among other inventions, he contrived a moving and revolving tower, to facilitate the work of sieges.

POSTEL, WILLIAM, one of the most learned men of his age, and one of the wildest visionaries, was born in Normandy, in 1510. In his youth he supported himself at the college of St. Barbe, by waiting upon the other students. His reputation for general learning and antiquarian research induced Francis I. to send him to the East to collect manuscripts, which commission he discharged so well as to be appointed professor of mathematics and languages, but he afterwards fell into disgrace, and lost his appointments. Having wandered about from place to place, he was recalled; but lost his situation again, and died in a monastery in 1581. Among the wild and extravagant notions that he entertained, one was, that he had died, and risen again with the soul of Adam; whence he called himself "Postellus restitutus;" he also maintained, that women shall have the dominion over men; and that his writings were revealed to him by Jesus Christ.

POSTHUMUS, MARCUS CAMBIANUS LATINIUS, a Roman emperor, one of the thirty tyrants, was of obscure family, but rose in the army till he obtained the chief command in Gaul. He assumed the imperial title in 257; ruled Gaul and part of Spain; waged a successful war against the Germans; and was at length put to death by his own soldiers in 267.

POSTLETHWAYTE, MALACHI, a London merchant and a commercial writer; born, about 1707; died, 1767. He was a Fellow of the Antiquarian Society, and the author of "The Dictionary of Trade and Commerce;" "Great Britain's true System;" "The Merchant's Public Counting-House;" "Britain's Commercial Interest," &c.

POTEMKIN, GREGORY ALEXANDROVITCH, a Russian prince and field-marshal, was born in 1736, near Smolensko. He distinguished himself against the Turks, particularly in the war of 1787, when he commanded in chief. He had acquired an unbounded influence over Catharine II. and was accordingly regarded as one of her especial favourites. His introduction to the empress, and subsequent elevation, are described as follows:—After Catharine had taken the sceptre from her weak husband, she paraded the streets of St. Petersburg, sword in hand. Young Potemkin, then twenty-six years of age, of a manly appearance, well-made and handsome, seeing that the sword which the empress used had not the dragon, a mark of distinction attached to the swords of the northern commanders, instantly unbuckled his, and presented it with a grace that was highly pleasing to Catharine, and from that day his promotion went rapidly forward. Though Orloff had enjoyed the title of favourite, it soon became known that he had a rival, and one that had vanity to boast of the favours he received.—Orloff had then recourse to intrigue; he availed himself of the absence of Potemkin, whom his royal mistress had honoured with a high commission in her army against the Turks, to introduce a youth to the notice of the empress who was devoted to his service: so that at Potemkin's return, though he came charged with victory, he found he had been robbed of his dearest treasure, and he instantly retired to a convent of monks at Newsky and exchanged his military decorations, for the coarse habit and the cowl. The empress sent her lady of honour, the countess de Bruce, to bring her a true report of Potemkin's situation, and having heard of his violent passion and the sacrifice he had made, she sent for him: he returned to the court, and soon reigned the master of the state, and even of the proud Catharine herself. Died, 1791.

POTENGER, or POTTINGER, JOHN, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was born in 1647, at Winchester, and educated at Wykeham's school, of which his father was head-master. Besides a variety of minor pieces, he composed "A Pastoral Reflection on Death," and translated Tacitus's "Life of Agricola." He studied at Oxford, and the Temple; was called to the bar; became comptroller of the pipe-office; and died in 1733.

POTHIER, ROBERT JOSEPH, an eminent French lawyer, was born at Orleans, in 1669. He became professor of law in the university of his native city, and died there in 1772, as much beloved for his virtues as admired for his extensive learning. His treatises on various legal subjects form seventeen octavo volumes, but his great work is a "Digest of the Pandects of Justinian," in 3 vols. folio.

POTOCKI, Count IGNATIUS, a Polish nobleman, born in 1741. He interested himself greatly in the attempts to free his country from the yoke of her more powerful neighbours; and after the overthrow of Kosciusko, with whom he co-operated, he was arrested, and sent a prisoner to Russia. Before the destruction of the Polish monarchy he was grand-marshal of Lithuania. Died, 1809.

POTOCKI, Count JOHN, born in 1769; a noble Polish historian, brother of the several Counts Potocki, most of whom are attached to Russia. He was one of the ambassadors to China in 1805; was author of a work on that country; "Sarmatian Researches;" "History of the Primitive Russians;" &c. Died, 1813.

POTOCKI, Count STANISLAUS, a Polish statesman and writer, born in 1737, at Warsaw. He was one of those who contributed most actively to establish the constitution of 1791; was president of the senate in 1818; and died in 1821. Among his works are a "Treatise on Eloquence and Style;" and "The Journey to Ciernogrod," a satirical romance.

POTOCKI, CLAUDIA, the wife of count Bernard Potocki, was born in the grand duchy of Posen, in 1802. She was the lineal descendant of the Polish ambassador, Dzialynski, who was sent to England in Elizabeth's reign, to remonstrate against the infraction of a treaty between this country and Poland, and whose bold and successful eloquence is recorded in history. During the patriotic struggle for Polish freedom, from 1830 to 1833, the countess Potocki not only became the munificent benefactress of her countrymen, but devoted her personal energies to the sacred cause, and alleviated by her kind attentions to the sick and wounded, much of the misery that the unequal contest entailed on the gallant spirits who strove to shake off the oppressor's yoke. Surrounded by wounded warriors, and the victims of cholera in the hospitals of Warsaw, neither the sight of hideous gashes, nor the fear of contagion deterred her from her course of charity: there, for seven successive months, she was constantly occupied; and when the day of adversity came, the remains of her fortune, her influence, her personal exertions, were entirely at the disposal of the unfortunate refugees. At one time, while residing at Dresden, where she had formed a ladies' committee for the relief of these brave men, she pledged her jewels, and most expensive dresses, for 40,000 florins, and the whole amount was instantly sent to its pious desination. For this, the Poles assembled at Dresden presented to her a bracelet, with an inscription commemorative of the noble act, and pointing it out for national gratitude. She at length fixed her residence at Geneva; and there, in the exercise of those Christian virtues, which will immortalize her name, but worn out by silent grief, she died in 1836.

POTT, PERSIVAL, an eminent surgeon, to whom the science is materially indebted for many improvements, was born in London, in 1713; and became principal surgeon to Bartholomew's hospital in 1740. He wrote "On Hernia," "On Fistula Lacrymalis," "On Hydrocele," "On Cataract," "On Wounds of the Head," &c.; was especially celebrated for the mildness and humanity of his treatment; and was the inventor of many useful surgical instruments. Died, 1788.

POTTER, JOHN, archbishop of Canterbury, was born in 1674, at Wakefield, in Yorkshire, in the grammar-school of which town he received the rudiments of a classical education. He then became a member of University college, Oxford, and, in 1697, printed his "Archæologia Græca," or the Antiquities of Greece, in 2 vols., 8vo. which has gone through many editions, and is almost indispensable to the classical student. He was appointed archbishop of Canterbury, and died in 1747. His theological works, including his "Discourse on Church Government," were collected and published in 3 vols. 8vo.

POTTER, FRANCIS, an ingenious divine, who wrote a curious book on the mystic number of 666 in the Revelations. He was also an able mathematician, and invented several hydraulic machines, for which he was elected a member of the Royal Society. Died, 1678.

POTTER, ROBERT, an English divine, and admirable classical scholar. He held the livings of Lowestoft and Kessingland, with a prebend in the cathedral of Norwich; and is advantageously known in the republic of letters by his excellent translations of Sophocles, Euripides, and Æschylus. He also wrote several ingenious poems; an "Answer to Dr. Johnson's Lives of the Poets;" "A Translation of the Oracle concerning Babylon," &c. Born, 1721; died, 1804.

POTTER, PAUL, a celebrated Dutch painter, was born at Enkhuyzen, in 1693; settled at the Hague; and painted cattle and landscapes, but was particularly successful in the former; the latter being designed merely to afford an opportunity for exhibiting animals in different attitudes and circumstances. His colouring is uncommonly brilliant, and for fidelity to nature he is unexcelled; his pictures are consequently held in the highest estimation. Died, 1684.

POULLE, Louis, preacher to the French king, and abbot of Nogent, died at Avignon in 1781, aged 79. His abilities as a preacher were very great, and his sermons, published in 1778, 2 vols. 12mo., possess a commanding eloquence, enriched with vivid imagery, and replete with noble sentiments.

POUPART, FRANCIS, a French physician and anatomist, was born at Mans, in 1660; studied at the Hotel Dieu; and was admitted into the academy of sciences. His name is given to an important ligature; and many of his papers, chiefly on entomology, are in the memoirs of the academy. Died, 1709.

POURCHOT, EDMUND, a learned Orientalist, and professor of philosophy in the college of the Four Nations at Paris, was born at Poilly, in 1651. He was seven times chosen rector of the college; of which he was also syndic forty years. Died, 1734.

POUSSIN, NICHOLAS, one of the most eminent of the French painters, was born in 1594, at Andelys, in Normandy. Having practised the art under different masters at Paris, he went to Rome, and studied the works of Raphael, Domenichino, and Titian, with great attention; but his taste for the antique prevailed, which is observable in all his works. Louis XIII. invited him to France in 1630; and gave him a pension, with apartments in the Louvre; but Poussin was so annoyed by the envy and intrigue of contemporary artists, that he returned to Rome, and remained there during the rest of his life. He chiefly excelled in landscapes, but all his works are valuable, and highly esteemed. Died, 1665.

POUSSIN, GASPARD, an eminent painter, whose proper name was DUGHET, was born at Rome, in 1613. His sister married Nicholas Poussin, which circumstances led him to study painting under that great master, whose name he adopted. He particularly excelled in the representation of landstorms, in which every tree seems agitated, and every leaf in motion. Died, 1678.

POWELL, DAVID, a learned antiquary, was born in Denbighshire, about 1632, and died in 1690.

POWELL, WILLIAM SAMUEL, an eminent divine, was born at Colchester, in 1717, and died in 1774.

POWELL, SIR JOHN, bart., an eminent and honest lawyer, was born of a very ancient and wealthy family at Pentrymerrick, in the parish of Llanwrda, Carmarthenshire. He was a judge in the Court of King's Bench, in 1688, and distinguished himself so much by his integrity and ability on the trial of the seven Bishops, that James the Second deprived him of his office, but he was restored to it at the revolution, and sat there, until his death in 1696. In Heber's life of Jeremy Taylor, it is stated that he was a pupil of that distinguished man, and was offered the Great Seal of England if he would have decided against the Bishops. When every effort to influence him against the bishops had failed, the court, it is said, made the same attempt upon his eldest son Thomas, who for many years represented the county of Carmarthen in parliament, which reaching the Judge's ears, he sent for him, and told him that if he accepted of any place or the promise of any place under government, he should consider it as intended to bias his judgment, and would disinherit him; and, as to himself, he would rather live upon his cockle-bank at Langharne, than do any thing so repugnant to his conscience.

POWELL, GEORGE, was an actor and dramatic writer, contemporary with Betterton and Colley Cibber, and is spoken of by the critics of the day with commendation. Died, 1714.

POWELL, WILLIAM, an eminent English actor, the pupil and protégé of Garrick, made his first appearance at Drury-lane in 1763, and in 1767 became one of the managers of Covent-garden theatre. Died, 1769.

POWNALL, THOMAS, a learned antiquary and politician, was born at Lincoln, in 1722. He held several situations under government; and having greatly exerted himself in America to suppress the rising spirit of discontent among the colonists, he was, in 1757, appointed governor of Massachusetts's Bay, and subsequently of Carolina. On returning to England in 1761, he was made director-general of the control office, with the military rank of colonel; but the latter part of his life was spent at Bath, in literary retirement. His principal works are, "On the Administration of the Colonies;" "Description of part of North America;" "Treatise on the Study of Antiquities;" "On the Antiquities of the Provincia Romana of Gaul;" "Descriptions of Roman Antiquities dug up at Bath;" "Intellectual Physics;" besides many political tracts. Died, 1806.

POZZETT, POMILIO, a learned Florentine, born in 1760, died in 1816. He was curator of the library at Modena, and member of the Bolognese Institute. He was author of "Elogio di Ridoifino Venuti;" "Vita del Fabroni," &c.

PRADT, ABBÉ DOMINIQUE DE, a French ecclesiastic, and a political writer, was born at Auvergne, in 1759. He was grand vicar at the revolution to the cardinal de Bouchehoucauld, and was elected deputy for the Norman clergy to the states-general in 1789. He opposed the union of his order to the tiers état; protested against the new order of things, and was consequently obliged to emigrate, establishing himself for a considerable time at Ham-burgh. In that city he published, in 1788, the first of his voluminous series of political pamphlets, called "Antidote to the Congress of Rastadt." In another, termed "Prussia and her Neutrality," he urged a coalition of Europe against the French republic. But after the revolution, which made Buonaparte first consul, he made interest with his patron, Daroc, to enter Buonaparte's service, and, by dint of well-timed flattery, became his grand almoner. On the coronation of the emperor, in 1804, at which he assisted, he was invested with the title of baron; received a gratuity of 40,000 francs, was made bishop of Poitiers, and was ordained by Pius VII. in person, in 1805. He afterwards officiated at Napoleon's coronation as king of Italy. In 1808 he accompanied him to the Bayonne conference, and was invested with the most delicate details of that great diplomatic difficulty. For this service, Napoleon gave him another gratuity of 50,000 francs, and made him, in 1809, archbishop of Malines, and member of the legion of honour. On the war against Russia occurring in 1812, he was sent ambassador to the duchy of Warsaw, as he states, in his "History of the Polish Embassy," painfully and violently against his wish. During the retreat from Moscow, Napoleon had an interview with him at a lone cottage, reproached him with treachery, and divested him of his embassy. On his return to Paris, he found all his employments taken from him. He was ordered to quit Paris for his diocese, and did not return till the fall of Napoleon, and the entry of the Bourbons into France, in 1814. He wrote his Vindictary History then, but did not publish it till after the battle of Waterloo, and Napoleon's departure for St. Helena. The attack in this pamphlet on the latter, and the chief Bonapartists, drew on him the enmity of the great majority of the public, but served his cause with the restored regime. He stated, in a preceding pamphlet, that it was by his advice the allied sovereigns resolved to break entirely with Napoleon, and restore the Bourbons. He was made by the latter chancellor of the legion of honour; but a new disgrace overtook him; he retired from the scene, and did not reappear till after the "hundred days." He subsequently ceded all the rights of his archbishop's see to the king of the Netherlands, for a yearly pension of 10,000 francs, and, retiring into private life, occupied himself with the continued publication of political pamphlets. In all these latter publications, however, he espoused the cause of wise and temperate constitutional reform. He died in 1837.

PRATT, CHARLES, EARL CAMDEN, a distinguished British lawyer and statesman, was the third son of Sir John Pratt, chief justice of the court of king's bench, and was born in 1713. On the advancement of Henley to the House of Lords in 1757, Mr. Pratt was appointed attorney-general; and in 1762 made chief justice of the common pleas. In 1765 he was created a peer, and the year following advanced to the dignity of lord chancellor. On the question of libels, lord Camden always opposed the doctrine laid down by high authority, viz. that juries were only the judges of the matter of fact, and not of the law. In 1782 he was appointed president of the council, which office he resigned the following year; but was afterwards re-appointed, and held it till his death in 1794.

PRATT, SAMUEL JACKSON, a novelist, poet, and miscellaneous writer, was born at St. Ives, in Huntingdonshire, in 1740. Early in life he went on the stage; but relinquished that pursuit, and subsequently became an itinerant lecturer, a bookseller, and, lastly, an author by profession. He settled at Bath, where, under the fictitious appellation of Courtney Melmoth, he published several novels and poems. The principal of his poems were, "The Tears of Genius, on the Death of Goldsmith;" "Sympathy;" and "Landscapes in Verse." His best novels were, "Liberal Opinions," 5 vols.; "Emma Corbett," 3 vols.; "The Pupils of Pleasure," 2 vols.; and "Family Secrets," 5 vols. Besides these works, he published "Gleanings through Wales, Holland, and Westphalia;" "Gleanings in England," 3 vols.; "Harvest Home;"

"The Fair Circassian," a tragedy; and some others. He died in 1814.

PRAXITELES, one of the greatest sculptors of Greece, united grandeur with grace, and flourished about 300 B.C. He worked both in bronze and marble, and Pliney has preserved a list of his principal statues. The group of Niobe, still in existence, has been attributed to him.

PREMONTVAL, ANDRÉ PIERRE LE GUAY DE, a French mathematician, born at Charenton, in 1716; died, 1767. He wrote "Préservatifs contre la Corruption de la Langue Française en Allemagne;" "La Monogamie, ou l'Unité en Mariage," 3 vols.; &c.

PRESTON, JOHN, an English divine, was born at Keyford, in Northamptonshire, in 1567, and became fellow of Queen's college, Cambridge, where he obtained great celebrity as a subtle disputant. Of his abilities in this way, he gave a specimen before king James on his visit to the university; for which lord Brook gave him a pension of 50*l.* per annum. Died, 1623.

PRESTON, THOMAS, a dramatic writer, was fellow of King's college, Cambridge, afterwards doctor of the civil law, and master of Trinity hall, where he died, in 1598. He acted a part in the tragedy of Dido, played before queen Elizabeth, who settled a pension of 20*l.* a year on him. He wrote a tragedy, called "The Life of Cambyse, king of Persia," which is mere Italian, and has not escaped the ridicule of Shakspeare, who, in Henry IV., makes Falstaff talk of speaking in "king Cambyse's vein."

PREVOST, ISAAC BENEDICT, an eminent naturalist, was born at Geneva, in 1755. Physics and natural history were the principal objects of his researches; and in 1810 he became professor of philosophy in the Protestant university of Montauban, where he died, in 1819.

PREVOST, PIERRE, a French painter, said to have been the inventor of panoramas, was born at Montignol, in 1764. Among the panoramas which he painted, were those of Paris, Rome, Naples, Amsterdam, Antwerp, London, Jerusalem, and Athens. The two last were the fruits of a visit to Greece and Asia in 1817; and he was engaged in painting a view of Constantinople, when he died, in 1823.

PREVOT D'EXILES, ANTHONY FRANCIS, one of the most fertile of French writers, was born in 1697, at Hedin, in Artois. His early life was extremely unsettled and changeable; he was alternately a Jesuit and a military officer; after which he entered into the monastery of St. Germain de Pres; but quitted that society also, and withdrew to Holland. His next removal was to London; but in 1734 he obtained leave to return to France, where he became secretary to the prince de Conti. His end was equally singular. In 1783 he was seized with apoplexy in the forest of Chantilly, and was found apparently lifeless. An ignorant magistrate being called in, ordered a surgeon, as precipitate as himself, to open the body, when a loud shriek from the victim convinced the spectators of their error: the abbé opened his eyes, but the incision was mortal, and he almost immediately expired. His works amount to one hundred and seventy volumes. The principal are, "Mémoires d'un Homme de Qualité," 6 vols.; "Histoire de M. PRICE, Sir JOHN, an eminent antiquary, of Brecknockshire, who wrote a "Defence of British History in Answer to Polydore Virgil." He died about 1553.

PRICE, JOHN, a learned critic, was born at London, in 1690. Having suffered considerably in the civil wars, he went to Florence, where he espoused the Roman catholic faith; and the grand duke appointed him keeper of the medals and Greek professor. He afterwards removed to Rome, where he died in 1676. He wrote Commentaries on the Psalms, the Gospel of St. Matthew, and the Acts; Notes upon Apuleius, &c.

PRICE, Dr. RICHARD, an eminent dissenting minister, universally known and celebrated for his great abilities in arithmetical calculations, and for very numerous and valuable writings, theological, moral, and scientific. He was born at Llangunnor, in Glamorganshire, in 1723, and was educated at Talgarth, in his native county, whence he removed to a Presbyterian academy in London, and became pastor of a nonconformist congregation, of Arian or semi-Arian principles, at Hackney, where he continued as long as he lived. He was the friend of man, and the most intrepid assertor of his rights. During the American war, he printed two pamphlets against that measure, one entitled "Observations on Civil Liberty;" and the other, "Observations on Civil Government;" for which the corporation of London voted him thanks, and a gold box; and the university of Glasgow conferred on him the degree of D.D. In 1778 he had a friendly controversy with Dr. Priestley, on materialism and necessity. On the termination of the war, Mr. Pitt consulted Dr. Price respecting the best mode of liquidating the national debt, the result of which, it is said, was the adoption of the sinking fund. When the French revolution broke out, the doctor distinguished himself by a sermon, "On the Love of Country," in which he hailed that event as the commencement of a glorious era. This drew upon the preacher some strong animadversions from Mr. Burke in his celebrated Reflections. Besides many papers in the Transactions of the Royal Society, of which he was a fellow, he published sermons and pamphlets, which established his character as a sound advocate for civil liberty, and a profound master of financial calculation. Died, 1791.

PRICHARD, REES, a divine, was born in Caermarthenshire, and educated at St. John's college, Oxford. He became vicar of Llandymodyfri, and rector of Llamedy, in his native county, prebendary of Brecon, and chancellor of St. David's. He was the author of some religious poems in the Welsh language, which still continue popular. Died, 1644.

PRIDEAUX, HUMPHRY, a learned divine, was born in 1648, at Padstow, in Cornwall; was educated at Westminster school, and at Christchurch college, Oxford; became dean of Norwich; and died in 1724. He wrote a "Life of Mahomet," "The Original Right of Tithes," &c.; but his great work is "The Connection of the History of the Old and New Testament."

PRIESTLEY, JOSEPH, an eminent dissenting divine and experimental philosopher, was born in 1733, at Fieldhead, in Yorkshire, and educated at Daventry. He became minister to the congregation at Needham Market, in Suffolk; whence he removed to Nantwich, in Cheshire, and next to Warrington, where the dissenters had formed a seminary. While tutor in this institution, he published the "History of Electricity," which procured his election into the Royal Society, and the degree of doctor of laws from Edinburgh. It was here also that his political opinions were first manifested, in an "Essay on Government." Soon after this he left Warrington, and went to Leeds, where he made those important discoveries with regard to the properties of fixed air, for which he obtained the Copley medal from the Royal Society in 1772. In 1776 he communicated to the same learned body his observations on respiration, being the first who experimentally ascertained that the common inspired air becomes both lessened and injured, by the action of the blood, as it passes through the lungs. He had already declared himself a believer in the doctrine of philosophical necessity, and expressed some doubts of the immateriality of the sentient principle in man. This doctrine he still more forcibly supported in his "Disquisitions on Matter and Spirit," and the obloquy which these works brought on him producing a coolness in his patron, lord Shelburne, the connexion was dissolved, the doctor retaining an annuity of 150*l.* per annum, by original agreement. He next removed to Birmingham, where he became once more minister of a dissenting congregation, and occupied himself in his "History of the Corruptions of Christianity," writing, also, in support of the claims of the dissenters for a repeal of the test acts. But it was the French revolution that afforded him the widest field; and he did not fail to display his zeal on that occasion. This excited the indignation of the high church party; and in the riots which took place in July, his house, library, manuscripts, and apparatus were committed to the flames by the mob, and he was exposed to great personal danger. After this he removed to Hackney, where he succeeded Dr. Price; but in 1794 he went to the United States of America, took up his abode at Northumberland, in Pennsylvania, and died there in 1804. His works extend to between seventy and eighty volumes. Besides those before mentioned are, "Lectures on General History;" on the "Theory and History of Language;" and on the "Principles of Oratory and Criticism;" "Hartleian Theory of the Human Mind;" "Letters to a Philosophical Unbeliever;" "Institutes of Natural and Revealed Religion," &c. As a philosopher, his fame principally rests on his pneumatic inquiries.

PRINCE, JOHN, a divine and antiquary, was born at Axminster, in Devonshire, and died about 1730. He published a work, entitled "The Worthies of Devon," which is exceedingly curious and valuable, but very scarce.

PRINGLE, Sir JOHN, an eminent physician and natural philosopher, was born in 1707, in Roxburghshire; was educated at St. Andrew's and Edinburgh, and afterwards studied at Leyden under Boerhaave and VanSwieten. After settling at Edinburgh, where he became professor of pneumatics and moral philosophy, he was appointed physician-general to the forces abroad, and was generally on the continent till the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle; after which he took up his residence in London, and engaged in medical practice. In 1750 he communicated to the Royal Society, of which he was a member, his "Experiments on Septic and Antiseptic Substances," for which he received the Copley medal. In 1752 he published his admirable "Observations on the Diseases of the Army;" and in 1761 he was appointed physician to the queen's household. In 1766 he was created a baronet, and, in 1772, was elected president of the Royal Society, which office he resigned, in consequence of ill health, in 1778; and died in 1782.

PRIOR, MATTHEW, an English poet, was born in 1664. He lost his father at an early age, and was brought up by his uncle, a tavern-keeper at Charing Cross, who sent him to Westminster school; but after some time, took him home to assist in the business. Here his classical knowledge becoming known to the earl of Dorset, he sent him to St. John's college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1688 Prior wrote, in conjunction with Charles Montagu, afterwards earl of Halifax, the burlesque poem of "The City Mouse and Country Mouse." In 1691 he was appointed secretary to the English embassy at the Hague, and soon after, King William made him one of his gentlemen of the bed-chamber. In 1697 he was secretary to the embassy at the treaty of Ryswick, and the following year he went in the same capacity to France. At length he was made under-secretary of state, and in 1701 he succeeded Locke as a commissioner at the board of trade. After the accession of queen Anne, he joined the Tories, by whom he was employed to negotiate the treaty of Utrecht, and was sent ambassador to the French court; from whence, at the commencement of the next reign, he was recalled, committed to custody, and threatened with an impeachment, which, however, did not take place. Being without any provision for his declining years, except his fellowship, he again applied himself to poetry; and having finished his "Solomon," he published his poems by subscription. The publication, being liberally encouraged by party zeal, produced a considerable sum, which was doubted by the earl of Oxford, at whose seat the author died, after a lingering illness, in 1721, and was interred in Westminster Abbey. His poems are light and harmonious, and the ease and vivacity with which he tells a story, constitutes the great charm of his poetry. Formerly his merit was overrated; at present, bare justice is scarcely done to his genius.

PRISCIAN, a celebrated grammarian of Cæsarea, in the fifth century, whose strict attention to correctness in composition, has made it proverbial to say of one who writes false Latin, that he breaks Priscian's head. He was the master of a school at Constantinople, and was the author of several grammatical works.

PRISCILLIAN, a heretic of the fourth century, was a native of Spain, where his opinions were condemned in 380, by a council held at Saragossa. Priscillian was ordained bishop of Avila, by his own party; but put to death, with some of his adherents, in 387. He is said to have united in his system the errors of the Gnostics, the Manicheans, the Arians, and the Sabellians; and the Priscillianists are charged with infamous practices, resulting from these opinions.

PRITCHARD, HANNAH, a celebrated English actress, born in 1711. She performed at Drury-lane, and was almost without a rival among her contemporaries in the personification of tragic characters. Died, 1768.

PROBUS, MARCUS AURELIUS VALERIUS, a Roman emperor, was born at Sirmium, in Pannonia; obtained several victories over the barbarians; reigned with honour to himself; but was at length slain by his mutinous troops, in 282.

PROCCACCINI, CAMILLO, an eminent painter, born at Bologna, in 1548. He studied the works of Parmegiano and Michael Angelo; and obtained a high reputation for the beauty of his colouring, and the lightness of his touch. Died, 1628.—His brother, GIULIO CESARE, born in 1548, adopted the style of Correggio, and surpassed all his other imitators. Died, 1625.—CARLO ANTONIO, another brother, excelled as a fruit and flower-painter.

PROCIDA, JOHN of, a native of Palermo, was born of a noble family, about 1235. He was the chief of the conspiracy against Charles of Anjou; and his efforts to accomplish the expulsion of the French displayed talents of a high order, and were finally crowned with success. Died, 1303.

PROCLUS, a Platonic philosopher, was born in 410, at Constantinople. He studied at Alexandria, and next at Athens, where he succeeded Syriacus in the Platonic school, and died in 485. Several of his works are extant.

PROCLUS, St., patriarch of Constantinople, was the disciple of Chrysostom. He died in 447.

PROCOPE COUTEAU, a physician and man of letters, was born at Paris, in 1684. He was the author of several professional tracts, remarkable for their satirical humour; he was also the author of the comedies of "Ariquin Balaord," and "Py-malion," besides several comic dramas, &c. Died, 1753.

PROCOPIUS, a Greek historian, was professor of rhetoric at Cesarea, and attended Belisarius as his secretary. He wrote a "History of the Wars of the Persians, the Gauls, and the Goths;" also a "Secret History, or Anecdotes;" a "History of his Times;" and a treatise on Public Buildings." Died, about 560.

PROCOPIUS of Gaza, a Greek sophist, who lived about A.D. 560.

PRODICUS, a celebrated sophist and rhetorician of the Isle of Cos, flourished about 390 B.C. He had Socrates for one of his disciples; and was put to death at an advanced age, on a charge of corrupting youth.

PRONAPIDES, a Greek poet, who, according to Diodorus Siculus, was the master of Homer.

PROPERTIUS, SEXTUS AURELIUS, a Latin poet, was born at Mevania, B.C. 59, and died about A.D. 12. Nothing more of his life is known, than that, after the end of the civil war, he found a patron at Rome in Mecenas, through whom he obtained the favour of the emperor. He appears to have been the bosom friend of Ovid, and was also on terms of intimacy with Virgil and other eminent contemporaries.

PROSPER, ST., was born in Aquitaine, at the beginning of the fifth century. He opposed the Pelagians with considerable ability; and died about 463.

PROTAGORUS, a Greek sophist, born at Abdera B.C. 488, was originally a porter, but by hearing Democritus, he attained such eminence, as to become a teacher at Athens; from which city he was banished on the charge of atheism. He then went to Epirus, where he resided several years; and died on his voyage to Sicily.

PROTOGENES, an eminent Grecian painter, who flourished about 336 B.C. was a native of Canus, in Caria, a city subject to Rhodes. A considerable part of his life was passed in obscurity, but he was at length brought into notice by Apelles giving a large price for one of his pictures. On the siege of Rhodes by Demetrius Poliorcetes, Protophenes is said to have continued tranquilly working at his house in the suburbs; and being asked by Demetrius why he ventured to remain without the walls of the city, he answered, that he well knew that the king was at war with the Rhodians, but not with the arts; with which answer Demetrius was so pleased, that he gave him a guard for his protection.

PROYART, LIEUVIN BONAVENTURE, a French historical writer, born in the province of Artois, in 1743. He adopted the ecclesiastical profession, and, devoting his time to public instruction, he was employed to organize the college of Puy, which, under his direction, became one of the most flourishing schools in the kingdom. Being a canon in the cathedral of Arras, he was at the commencement of the Revolution deprived of his preferment, and obliged to emigrate to the Netherlands.

He returned to France on the conclusion of the concordat; but on publishing his work, entitled, "Louis XVI. et ses Vertus aux Prises avec la Perversité de son Siècle," 5 vols., in 1792, where he was arrested and confined in the Bicêtre, which he did not long survive. His works are numerous, and form 17 vols.

PRUDHOMME, L., editor of "Le Journal des Révolutions de Paris," was born at Lyons, in 1732, where he was brought up to the business of a bookseller. In 1768 he fixed his residence in Paris, and became a zealous promoter of the new principles. In 1789 he established the above journal, which had for its motto, "The great seem to us to be great, only because we are on our knees: let us rise!" Although he constantly assailed the government in this publication, as well as in the countless pamphlets which were issued by him, he opposed the tyranny of Robespierre, and was in consequence arrested as a royalist; but having speedily obtained his liberty, he quitted Paris, and was absent till the death of that execrable dictator. Among his numerous works, is a "General History of the Crimes committed during the Revolution," 6 vols. Died, 1830.

PRUDHON, PIERRE PAUL, a French painter, born in 1760, at Cluny, where he was educated by the monks of the celebrated abbey of that place. After having studied at Rome, he settled at Paris, and finally gained celebrity by his famous allegorical picture, "Crime pursued by Divine Justice." Died, 1823.

PRYNNE, WILLIAM, a learned lawyer, political writer, and antiquary, was born in 1603, at Swanswick, in Somersetshire; was educated at Bath grammar-school, and Oriel college, Oxford; and, removing to Lincoln's Inn to study the law, became barrister, bench, and reader of that society. His attendance upon the lectures of Dr. Preston, a distinguished puritan, strongly attached him to that sect, and he began to write as early as 1627, attacking the drinking of healths, love-locks, popery, and Arminianism, which he deemed the enormities of the age. In 1632 he published his work against theatrical exhibitions, entitled "Histrio-Mastix;" and having therein libelled the queen, he was the subject of a star-chamber prosecution, and condemned to pay a fine of 5000*l.*, to be expelled the university of Oxford and Lincoln's Inn, to be degraded from his profession of the law, to stand twice in the pillory, losing an ear each time, and to remain a prisoner for life. Prynne continued writing against prelacy in prison; until, for a virulent piece, entitled "News from Ipswich," he was again sentenced by the star-chamber to a fine of 5000*l.*, to lose the remainder of his ears in the pillory, and to be branded on each cheek with the letters S. L. (seditious libeller). This sentence was also executed, and he was removed for imprisonment to Caernarvon castle, and afterwards to the island of Jersey. In 1640 he obtained his liberty, was elected member for Newport, and bore a prominent part in the trial of Laud, his former persecutor. After the overthrow of Charles, however, Prynne endeavoured to effect an accommodation between him and his subjects; and he opposed Cromwell with such boldness, that the Protector imprisoned him. He joined in the restoration of Charles II.; was appointed chief keeper of the records in the Tower; and died in 1669. He wrote a prodigious number of books, chiefly on politics and religion; also the "History of archbishop Laud;" and the "Lives of kings John, Henry III. and Edward I."

PSALMANAZAR, GEORGE, a literary impostor, was born in France, in 1679, and received an excellent education. He commenced his career by leading a wandering life, and assumed the habit of a pilgrim; but this not answering his purpose, he pretended to be a native of Formosa; and to keep up the delusion, he invented a new alphabet, and a grammar of the Formosan tongue. At this time he became acquainted with a clergyman named Innes, who, conceiving he could turn the impostor to good account, persuaded the pretended Formosan to suffer himself to be converted to the church of England; and the clergyman and his new disciple went to London, where the latter was presented to bishop Compton and others, and the former was rewarded for his zeal with church preferment. Psalmanazar had the effrontery to translate the Church Catechism, into his newly invented Formosan language; and he published a "History of Formosa," which was considered as authentic by many eminent men; nor was the cheat discovered till after he had been sent to Oxford. After this he gained a subsistence by writing for the booksellers; and became remarkable in his latter years for his sincere and unaffected piety. A large portion of the ancient part of the "Universal History" was written by him; and he left behind him his own "Memoirs." Died, 1763.

PTOLEMY, CLAUDIUS, a geographer and astronomer of antiquity, was born, as is supposed, at Pelusium, in Egypt, about A.D. 70. He resided at Alexandria, where he had an observatory; but it is evident from his cosmography, that he was also a voyager, and had visited many of the countries which he has described. He corrected Hipparchus's catalogue of fixed stars, and formed tables of the planetary motions. The scattered observations of the ancients were first collected by him, and reduced to a system, known under the name of the Ptolemaic, which makes the earth the centre of the solar system.

PUBLIUS SYRIUS, a comic poet of Syria, who flourished at Rome about 50 years before the Christian era.

PUFFENDORF, SAMUEL, baron Von, an eminent German civilian and historian, born near Chemnitz, in Saxony, in 1631. He was successively in the service of the Elector palatine, Charles XI. of Sweden, and the elector of Brandenburg. Very numerous are the works of this learned and excellent man; but the most important, and what will immortalize his name, is his treatise "De Jure Naturæ et Gentium." It is indeed a body of the law of nature and nations well digested, and, as some think, preferable to Grotius's book, De Jure Belli et Pacis, since the same subjects are treated in a more extensive manner, and with greater order. His other principal works are, "The Elements of Jurisprudence;" "The State of the German Empire;" an "Introduction to the Study of Europe;" the "Life of Gustavus of Sweden;" the "Life of Frederic III., of Brandenburg;" &c. He died at Berlin, in 1694.

PUGATSCHOFF, JEMELJAN, of YEMELKA, the leader of a predatory band in Russia, and a daring impostor, was a Don Cossack, and born in 1726. After serving in the Prussian and Austrian armies, he returned to his own country; and being possessed of a striking personal resemblance to the lately deceased emperor, Peter III., he was, in 1773, encouraged to pass himself for that monarch. At first he had but few followers, but they increased to the number of 16,000 men. He several times defeated the troops of the empress; captured Kasaan, the old capital of the empire; and continued his ravages for nearly two years. At length, just as Moscow was threatened, he was betrayed by some of his party, and executed, together with the other rebel leaders, at Moscow, in 1775.

PUGET, PETER, a celebrated French sculptor, painter, and architect, was born in 1622, at Narbonne; resided for a considerable time at Genoa; but was recalled to France by Colbert; and died there, in 1694. Many of his finest productions are at Genoa; but his colossal group of Milo, and his Andromeda, are at Versailles.

PUGHE, DR. WILLIAM OWEN, a celebrated Welch lexicographer and author, whose life was devoted to the literature of his native country, died at the foot of Cader Idris (the mountain near which he was born), in June, 1835, aged 75.

PUISAYE, Count JOSEPH, an able royalist chief, was descended from an ancient and noble family, and born at Montagne, about 1754. He was intended for the church, but preferred the military profession, and obtained the brevet of colonel in the royal Swiss corps. He sat in the constituent assembly, and regularly voted with the partisans of political regeneration. In 1793, forces having been collected in the northern departments to oppose the Jacobins, he was appointed to act as second in command under general Wimpfen, and was consequently proscribed by the convention. He took refuge in Brittany, where he organized a formidable body of Chouans. He visited England in 1794; obtained a considerable succour; was invested with unlimited powers by the count d'Artois; and on his return to France, every preparation was made by the Bretons to join the English and emigrant troops as soon as they should appear on the French coasts. But his hopes were blasted by envious intrigues of his own party; the expedition was diverted to La Vendee; and the unfortunate disaster at Quiberon followed. He at length resigned his commission, and went to Canada; but he subsequently came to England, where he resided till his death, in 1827.

PULCI, LUIGI, an Italian poet, was born at Florence, in 1431. His principal performance, entitled "Morgante Maggiore," is a poetical romance, and was printed at Venice, in 1486; and a spirited translation of it, by lord Byron, was given in "The Liberal." Paoli also wrote sonnets, published with those of Matteo Franco, in which the two authors satirized each other for their amusements.—His brothers, BERNARDO and LUCA, were also poets. The former published a translation of the eclogues of Virgil, and a poem on the passion of Christ; the latter was the author of "Glostra di Lorenzo de Medici," and an epic romance, called "Il Ciriffo Calvaneo."

PULTENEY, WILLIAM, earl of Bath, the political antagonist of Sir Robert Walpole, was born in 1683, and educated at Westminster-school and Christ-church, Oxford. After travelling through Europe, he was elected into parliament, and became distinguished as a zealous whig. On the accession of George I. he was appointed a privy-counsellor, and secretary at war; but a dispute with Sir Robert Walpole caused his removal to the ranks of the opposition. He joined Bolingbroke in conducting a paper, called "The Craftsman," the object of which was to annoy the minister. This produced a duel between Pulteney and lord Hervey; and the king was so much displeased with the conduct of the former, that he struck his name out of the list of privy-counsellors, and also from the commission of the peace. On the resignation of Walpole, in 1741, Pulteney was created earl of Bath; but from that time his popularity and influence ceased. Died, 1764.

PULTENEY, RICHARD, a physician and botanist, was born at Loughborough, in 1730. He first practised as a surgeon at Leicester; but in 1764 he took the degree of M.D. at the university of Edinburgh, and settled at Blandford, in Dorsetshire. He was the author of "Historical and Biographical Sketches of the progress of Botany in England," besides several professional treatises, and a variety of papers in the Philosophical Transactions, &c. Died, 1801.

PURCELL, HENRY, a celebrated musical composer, was born in 1658; and being admitted as a chorister in the King's chapel, was brought up under Dr. Blow, organist of Westminster-abbey, and afterwards of the chapel-royal; and from this period, his fame seems to have increased rapidly, his anthems and church music in general being popular in all the cathedrals of the kingdom; nor were his compositions for the stage and music-room less successful. Among his works are many excellent anthems, sonatas, catches, rounds, glees, &c.; the opera of "Dioclesian;" and "Orpheus Britannicus."

PURCHAS, SAMUEL, a divine, was born in 1577, at Thaxted, in Essex; and died in 1625, rector of St. Martin's, Ludgate. His principal work is the well known "Collection of Voyages," in 5 vols., and his "Pilgrimages, or Relations of the World."

PURVER, ANTHONY, a self-instructed man, of humble birth, was born at Up Hurstbourne, in Hampshire, in 1702, and was apprenticed to a shoemaker. Being afterwards employed in keeping sheep, he found leisure for study; and his curiosity being excited by the perusal of a tract in which some inaccuracies in the authorized version of the Bible were pointed out, he resolved to make himself acquainted with the Scriptures in their original tongues. Accordingly, with some assistance from a Jew, he acquired a knowledge of the Hebrew, then applied to the Greek, and next studied Latin. On settling at Andover, as a schoolmaster, he undertook the extraordinary labour of translating the Bible into English; which work he actually accomplished, and it was printed at the expense of Dr. Fothergill, in 2 vols. folio. Died, 1777.

PUTTENHAM, GEORGE, an English writer, who lived in the court of Edward VI., and became one of the gentlemen pensioners to queen Elizabeth. He died about 1600. His works are "Elptine;" "Partheniades;" and "The Art of Poesie."

PUTTER, JOHN STEPHEN, an eminent German writer on subjects of national policy, was a native of Iserlohn, in Westphalia. He was at first a professor of history at Gottingen, and subsequently dean of the faculty of jurisprudence. His principal works are, "Institutiones Juris Publici Germanici;" "A Sketch of the History of Germany;" "An Historical Development of the Constitution of the German Empire;" "The Literature of German Law;" and his "Autobiography." Died, 1807.

PUY, PIERRE DU, an antiquary and historian, was the son of Claude du Puy, an advocate of some eminence, and born at Agen, in 1582. He was related to De Thou, whose great work he edited, in conjunction with Rigault. Du Puy was appointed counsellor and librarian to the king; who employed him to defend his rights over the bishoprics of Metz, Toul, and Verdun. He was the author of a variety of valuable works connected with politics, ecclesiastical affairs, and national history; and died in 1651.

PUY, LOUIS DO, a learned writer, was born at Bugey, in 1709. He was editor of the "Journal des Savans," thirty years, secretary to the academy of inscriptions, and librarian to the prince de Soubise. He translated Sophocles into French; and wrote a work on geometry.

PUY-SEGUR, JAMES DE CHASTENET, lord of, a French officer, was born in Armagnac, in 1600. He rose to the rank of lieutenant general; but though he served in forty campaigns, was present at one hundred and twenty sieges, and in more than thirty battles, he never received a wound. On retiring from the service, he wrote his own "Memoirs;" and died in 1682.—His son, born in 1655, was also an excellent officer, and became a marshal of France. Died, 1743.

PYE, HENRY JAMES, poet laureat, was descended from an ancient Berkshire family, and born in London, in 1743. He was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford; was for some time an officer in the Berkshire militia; and ruined his fortune by the expenses of a contested election as a candidate for the representation of the county. In 1790 he was appointed poet laureat; and in 1792, one of the police magistrates. His principal works are, "Alfred," an epic poem; "The Progress of Refinement;" "The Democrat;" "The Aristocrat;" translations from Aristotle, Pindar, and Homer; a collection of poems, 2 vols.; and "Comments on the Commentators on Shakspeare." Died, 1813.

PLYLE, THOMAS, an English divine, was born at Stoney, in Norfolk, in 1674, and was educated at Caius college, Cambridge. On taking the part of bishop Hoadley, in the Bangorian controversy, that prelate rewarded him with a prebend and residentiaryship in Salisbury cathedral. He was the author of a "Paraphrase on the Historical Books of the Old Testament," 4 vols.; "Paraphrase on the Acts and Epistles," 3 vols.; a "Paraphrase on the Revelations of St. John;" and three volumes of "Sermons." Died, 1736.

PYM, JOHN, a parliamentarian in the reign of Charles I. and by profession a barrister, was a native of Somersetshire, and born in 1584. He became a member of parliament in the reign of James I., and distinguished himself as a zealous opponent of the court, being a rigid puritan. In the next reign he acted with greater violence, and was one of the five members who were demanded by the king to be delivered to him as traitors. In 1643 he was appointed lieutenant of the ordnance; and died shortly after.

PLYNSON, RICHARD, a printer, was by birth a Norman, but naturalized in England by letters patent, and appointed King's printer. He is noticed here on account of his being the first that introduced the Roman letter into this country. Died, about 1530.

PYRRHO, the celebrated philosopher of Elis, and founder of the sect called Sceptics, or Pyrrhonists, flourished about, a.c. 340. He was originally a painter, but afterwards became a disciple of Anaxarchus, whom he accompanied to India, in the train of Alexander the Great, and while there obtained a knowledge of the doctrines of the Brahmins, Gymnosophists, Magi, and other Eastern philosophers. On the return of Pyrrho to Greece, the inhabitants of Elea made him their high priest, and the Athenians gave him the rights of citizenship. Died, a.c. 280.

PYRRHUS, king of Epirus, a.c. 300, was one of the greatest warriors of antiquity. He ascended the throne of his father when but twelve years old; and being driven from it, five years afterwards, by Neoptolemus, he soon regained it, and increased his power by the conquest of Macedonia. Of his various contests, that with the Roman republic occupies the most distinguished place in history. The Romans entertained the highest opinion of his military skill, and from him, in fact, they learned most of their art in war. He was fond of glory, and personally brave, even to rashness; but his faults of ambition were counterbalanced by acts of courtesy and benevolence. He was killed by a tile thrown from the top of a house at the siege of Argos, a.c. 272.

PYTHAGORAS, one of the most celebrated philosophers of antiquity, and the founder of the Italic school, was the son of Mnemarchus, an engraver of Samos, and born at Sidon, in Phœnicia, about 560 a.c. while his parents were travelling in that country. His history is mingled with many fables. In Egypt he was probably admitted to the mysteries of the priests, and made acquainted with the whole range of Coptic learning. From Egypt he is said to have journeyed to the East, and visited the Persian and Chaldean Magi, as well as the Indian Gymnosophists. After his return, he opened a school at Samos, and taught his doctrines in a symbolic form; in which veiled manner he treated of God and the human soul, and delivered a vast number of precepts relating to the conduct of life, political as well as civil. He also made considerable advances in the sciences, particularly in arithmetic, geometry, and astronomy. After a life of extensive travel, constant labour, and severe persecution, he died at Metapontum, in the temple of the Muses, where, according to tradition, he perished from want of sustenance, at eighty years of age. If we measure the glory of a philosopher by the duration of his doctrine, and by the extent of its propagation, nothing can equal that of Pythagoras, since most of his opinions are at this day literally followed in the greatest part of the world. What are called "The Golden Verses of Pythagoras," have been frequently published, and are well known; but it is supposed that this short abridgment of his popular doctrines was the work of some later writer.

PYTHEAS, was a celebrated ancient traveller, who lived in the time of Alexander the Great, and born at Massilia, now Marseilles, then a colony of the Phœnicians. He was a good mathematician, and is said, not only to have explored the coast as far as Cadiz, but to have sailed from thence to the Ultima Thule, or Iceland, where he made some astronomical observations.

QUADRATUS, a bishop of Athens, who lived in the early part of the second century. He was the successor of Publius, who was martyred in the persecution under Adrian; and when that emperor visited the Athenian capital in 120, Quadratus presented to him "An Apology for the Christian Religion," which, Eusebius says, had the desired effect of occasioning a temporary cessation of the persecution. Of this work there is only a fragment remaining; but it is curious for the testimony it gives to the reality of the miracles of Christ and his apostles, asserting, that in his time several of the persons were living in whose favour the miracles were wrought.

QUADRIO, FRANCIS XAVIER, an Italian Jesuit, born in the Valtelline, in 1693. He was the author of "Dissertations on the Valtelline," 3 vols.; a "History of Poetry," 7 vols.; &c. Died, 1736.

QUAGLIATI, PAOLO, a musician and actor of modern Rome; the first who produced dramatic action or representation in music ever witnessed in that city. This was during the carnival of 1806, and the performance was on a stage in the open air.

QUANZ, JOHN JOACHIM, an eminent musical composer and flute player; born near Gottingen, 1697; died, 1773. He was the author of a "Series of Pieces for two Flutes;" "Instructions," &c.

QUARIN, JOSEPH, first physician to the emperor Joseph II., was born at Vienna, in 1773; obtained great reputation for medical skill; was created a count in 1797; filled the office of rector in the university six times; and died in 1814.

QUARLES, FRANCIS, an English poet, was born in 1592, near Romford, Essex, and received his education at Cambridge. He obtained the place of cup-bearer to the queen of Bohemia, daughter of James I., and was afterwards secretary to archbishop Usher in Ireland; from which country he was driven, with the loss of his property, by the rebellion of 1641, and was appointed chronologer to the city of London. At the commencement of the civil wars, he wrote a work entitled the "Loyal Convert," which gave offence to the parliament; and, when he afterwards joined the king at Oxford, his property was sequestered, and his books and MSS. plundered. He was so much affected by his losses, that grief is supposed to have hastened his death, in 1644. Of the works of Quarles, in prose and verse, the most celebrated is his "Emblems," a set of designs in prints, illustrated by verses, which, with all their false taste and conceit, have merit, and still continue to be printed. His other works are, "Argalus and Parthenia," a romance; "Enchiridion of Meditations;" "Divine Fancies;" and "The Shepherd's Oracles."

QUATROMANNI, SERTORIUS, an Italian writer, was born at Cozenza, in 1551, and died in 1606. His life was passed in the cultivation of poetry and literature; but he was of a most irritable temper, which rendered him odious to all the learned of his time. He translated the Eneid into Italian verse, and wrote several poems, both Latin and Italian.

QUELLINUS, ERASMUS, an eminent painter, was born at Antwerp, in 1607. He was a pupil of Rubens, and executed several pictures of great merit. He died in 1678, and left a son, JOHN ERASMUS QUELLINUS, whose historical pieces are held in estimation. He had also a nephew, ARTHUR QUELLINUS, who was an excellent sculptor.

QUENSTEDT, JOHN ANDREW, a Lutheran divine, born at Quedlinburgh, in 1617. He was professor of divinity in the university of Wittemberg for many years; wrote a "system of divinity," 4 vols., and several other theological works; and died in 1688.

QUERENGHI, ANTONIO, an Italian poet, born at Padua, in 1346, distinguished himself at an early age for erudition; was secretary of the Sacred College under five popes; and died at Rome in 1633.

QUERLON, ANNE GABRIEL MEUSNIER DE, a celebrated French journalist, was born at Nantes, in 1702, and died in 1780. For upwards of twenty years he conducted a periodical paper in Brittany, called "Les Petites Affiches;" he was also a writer in the "Gazette de France;" the "Journal Etranger," and the "Encyclopédie." His works are "Les Impostures Innocentes;" "Le Testament de l'Abbe des Fontaines;" "Le Code Lyrique;" "A Continuation of Prevot's History of Voyages," and a translation of "Marsy's Latin Poem on Painting."

QUERNO, CAMILLO, a Neapolitan poet of the 15th century, who acquired great fame by his facility in extempore versification, and obtained the name (at first given in a joke by some of his convivial friends while at Rome, in 1514,) of arch-poet. Leo X. was much pleased with his buffoonery, and often admitted him to his table. Died, 1528.

QUER Y MARTINEZ, JOSEPH, a Spanish botanist, born at Perpignan, in 1695. He was a surgeon-major in the army, and made good use of the opportunities which his visits to the coast of Africa afforded him, while attached to his corps, of collecting numerous plants and seeds. This led to the formation of a royal botanic garden at Madrid, over which Quer presided. He wrote and published the first four volumes of "Flora Espanola, o Historia de las Plantas que se crian en Espagna," which was completed by the publication of two volumes more, by Orteza. Died, 1764.

QUESADA, —, a Spanish general, who, after having signalized himself as a leader in the army of the Faith, became attached to the queen's cause, and held a chief command. He was very unpopular with the republican party in Spain; and during an insurrectionary movement on the part of the populace and some of the soldiery, which he had been actively engaged in quelling, he found it necessary to make his escape from the capital. He was, however, discovered a few miles off, taken, and placed in confinement; but the infuriated mob being determined to wreak summary vengeance on him, they murdered him in his prison, and carried his mangled relics to Madrid, where, with savage exultation, they exhibited them in the public streets. August, 1836.

QUESNAY, FRANCIS, a physician, but more known as a writer on political economy, was born in 1694, near Montfort l'Amaury, in the isle of France. His father was a farmer, and he acquired the rudiments of his profession from the surgeon of his native village. He then went to Paris, and became secretary to a society instituted for the improvement of surgery; but afterwards he took his degree in medicine, and became physician to Louis XV., who loved to converse with him, and called him his "thinker." He was the author of "A Philosophical Essay on the Animal Economy," 3 vols.; "Physiocracy;" and various articles in the Encyclopædia, &c. to promulgate his doctrines—to which some have unjustly attributed the French revolution. Died, 1774.

QUESNE, ABRAHAM DU, a distinguished French officer, was born in Normandy, in 1610, and brought up in the marine service, under his father. In 1644 he went to Sweden, where he became an admiral; and on his return to France, in 1647, he exerted himself effectually in restoring the navy. He was next employed against the Dutch, whom he defeated in three engagements, in the last of which De Ruyter was killed. After this, he struck such terror into the states of Tunis and Tripoli, that they were compelled to seek a peace with France, by submission. For his eminent services he was rewarded with an estate, which the king erected into a marquise. Died, 1688.

QUESNEL, PASQUIER, a priest who was born at Paris, in 1634, and became the head of the sect of Jansenists. He wrote a great many books, chiefly of the polemic kind; but gave offence to the court of Rome by his edition of the works of pope Leo the Great; and when his celebrated "New Testament, with Moral Reflections," in 8 vols. appeared, it was formally condemned, and the author was obliged to retire to Holland, where he died, in 1719.

QUESNEL, Baron, born in 1773; a general officer, who served with distinction in most of Napoleon's campaigns. He was made, on the restoration in 1814, grand officer of the legion of honour; and during the "hundred days" in 1815, was found drowned in the Seine.

QUESNOY, FRANCIS DU, a sculptor, was born at Brussels, in 1592. He acquired the principles and practice of the art from his father, but far excelled him. The arch-duke Albert gave him a pension, and sent him to Italy, where he made himself known by some beautiful works, particularly a crucifixion wrought in ivory, which procured him the patronage of pope Urban VIII. He particularly excelled in making models and bas-reliefs of Cupids and children, which he finished with peculiar grace and delicacy; but he was at the same time quite capable of executing works of the highest importance; of which a St. Susanna, in the chapel of Loretto, and a St. Andrew, in St. Peter's, afford sufficient proof. He died in 1646.

QUEVEDO VILLEGAS, FRANCISCO DE, a Spanish poet and satirist, was born at Madrid, in 1570. He was a knight of the order of St. Jago, and was thrown into prison for an alleged libel on the count d'Olivarez, prime-minister to Philip IV.; but when that statesman was disgraced, he recovered his liberty. He died in 1647. He wrote "The Spanish Parnassus;" "Visions of Hell;" "Comic Tales," and various works, satirical and religious, both in verse and prose; and holds a high rank among Spanish satirists.

QUEVEDO, P., the benevolent Spanish bishop of Orense, who at the revolution maintained 200 French refugee clergymen at his own cost, estimated annually at 80,000 francs. Died, 1818.

QUICK, JOHN, an eminent comic actor, was the son of a brewer in London, where he was born in 1744. When only fourteen years old he left his home, and joined a company of provincial actors; and as he gradually rose in his profession, he obtained an engagement at the Haymarket in 1769, and subsequently established his fame by his admirable performance of Mordred in "Love à la Mode." He afterwards went to Covent-garden, where for many years he held a prominent station, filling the best parts in light comedy. In 1798 he retired from the stage, and died in 1831.

QUIEN DE LA NEUFVILLE, JAMES LX, an historian, was born at Paris, in 1647. He served first in the army, and afterwards became an advocate, but without success; on which he had recourse to literature for support. He published the "History of Portugal," which obtained him a place in the academy of inscriptions. His "Treatise on the Use of Poets among the Ancients and Moderns," procured him the direction of the posts of French Flanders, and a pension. Died, 1738.

QUILLET, CLAUDIUS, a French physician and ingenious Latin poet; born, 1602; died, 1661. His chief work is a poem in four books, entitled "Callipædia."

QUIN, JAMES, an eminent actor, was born in London, in 1693. He performed at Drury-lane and at the theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields; and though for a considerable period he was confined to inferior parts, he at length rose into high reputation, and was without a rival till the appearance of Garrick. His last performance was Falstaff (1753), in which character he is supposed never to have been excelled. He survived his retreat several years, which he spent chiefly at Bath, where his fund of anecdote, and pointed sense, made him much sought after. Quin, who was convivial, and too fond of the bottle, was often coarse and quarrelsome on those occasions, which led to two or three hostile encounters, one of which proved fatal to his antagonist. He was otherwise manly, sensible, and generous. He had been employed by Frederic, prince of Wales, to instruct the royal children in elocution; and when Quin was informed of the graceful manner in which George the Third delivered his first speech from the throne, he emphatically said, "Aye, it was I who taught the boy to speak." About this time he obtained a pension. Died, 1766.

QUINAULT, PHILIP, a French dramatic poet, was born at Paris in 1636, and died in 1688. His operas were highly and deservedly popular, but they excited the envy of Boileau, who attacked them with characteristic asperity. They were printed at Paris, with his Life, in 1778, 5 vols. 12mo.

QUINCY, JOHN, an English physician and medical writer of the last century, who practised his profession, and delivered lectures in London, where he died in 1723. Among the different works he produced, was his "Lexicon Physico-Medicum," which had served as the basis of Dr. Hooper's Medical Dictionary, and other subsequent compilations of a similar nature.

QUINETTE, NICHOLAS MARIE, was born at Solmons, where, previous to the Revolution, he practised as an attorney. He voted for the death of Louis XVI.; was a commissioner in the army of Dumouriez, and was one of the four deputies delivered up to the Austrians, who were afterwards exchanged for the infant princess. In 1799 he was appointed minister of the interior; was a member of the chamber of peers during the hundred days; and after the second abdication of Napoleon, he was called by Fouché to form a part of the provisional government. In 1815 he was banished as a regicide; retired to Brussels; and died in 1821.

QUINTILIAN, MARCUS FABIUS, a celebrated orator and critic, who is supposed to have been born about A.D. 43, at Rome; followed Galba into Spain, and taught rhetoric there; and died, as is supposed, in his eightieth year. His "Institutiones Oratoricæ" may be justly pronounced the finest system of rhetoric ever written. This invaluable work was discovered by Poggio in 1415, in the abbey of St. Gal.

QUINTINIE, JOHN DE LA, a celebrated French horticulturist, was born at Poltiers, in 1626. He was originally an advocate, but took more pleasure in the study of horticulture; to perfect himself in which, he visited Italy, and on his return to France, became director-general of the royal gardens. He died at an advanced age.

QUINTUS CALABER, or QUINTUS SMYRNEUS, a Greek poet, who wrote a supplement to Homer's Iliad. He is supposed to have lived in the fifth century, and to have been a native of Smyrna. His poem was first brought to light by cardinal Bessarion, who found it in the church of St. Nicolas, near Otranto, in Calabria, whence he had the name of Calaber.

QUIRINI, ANGELO MARIA, a cardinal, was born at Venice, in 1634. Benedict XIII. made him archbishop and cardinal, which dignities he filled with great reputation. He died in 1745. Cardinal Quirini collected a magnificent library, which he gave to the Vatican; and though he was a zealous champion of the papacy, his writings are marked by candour and moderation.

QUIROGA, JOSEPH, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Lugo, in Galicia, and distinguished himself as a missionary in America. During his residence there he collected much information respecting the countries he visited, and on his return published his travels. Died, 1784.

QUIROS, PEDRO FERNANDEZ DE, a celebrated Spanish navigator of the 16th century, who explored many of the islands afterwards visited by captain Cook. Died, 1614.

QUITA, DOMINGOS DOS REIS, a Portuguese poet, was born in 1729. He was apprenticed to a barber, but his attachment to learning enabled him to overcome the difficulties he had to experience; and making himself master of Italian, Spanish, and French, he wrote verses, and at length obtained the patronage of count San Lorenzo. He was the author of "Inez de Castro," and four other tragedies; besides many sonnets, elegies, pastorals, &c. Died, 1770.

R.

RABANUS-MAURUS, MAGNENTIUS, a learned German prelate, was born at Fulda, in 783; became abbot of the monastery there, and was afterwards archbishop of Mentz. He was a man of great erudition, which is displayed in several treatises and commentaries written by him. Died, 856.

RABAUT DE ST. ETIENNE, JOHN PAUL, one of the most steady, moderate, and honourable of the French revolutionists, was born at Nîmes, in 1741; for which city he was chosen a deputy to the constituent assembly in 1790. He attached himself to the party of the Girondists. His father was proscribed when he was born; and he relates, in a short memoir of his life, attached to a romance of his publication, called "Le Vieux Cevenol," that his infancy was passed in continual danger and alarm, and that he never knew when he awoke, where his mother and her friends would conduct him to sleep at night. He was proscribed, like the rest of the Moderates, for opposing the excesses of the Mountain party in 1793. He was sheltered by several female friends of his wife for some days; but being at length discovered, he was immediately guillotined, after a short form of identification before the revolutionary tribunal. His wife killed herself; and all those who assisted in concealing him were guillotined. One of his numerous political works is, "Sur la Necessité d'Etablir une Constitution."

RABELAIS, FRANÇOIS, a celebrated French wit and satirist, was born at Chinon, in Touraine, about 1483. He was at first a monk, but in consequence of having been punished for some indecorous behaviour, he quitted the Benedictine order, studied medicine at Montpellier, and for a time practised as a physician. He subsequently obtained, through the influence of his patron, cardinal du Bellay, whom he accompanied to the court of Rome, the rectory of Meudon; and died in 1553. He was the author of several books; but the only one by which he is known, is the romance called "The Lives, Heroic Deeds, and Sayings of Gargantua and Pantagruel," an extragant satire upon monks, priests, popes, and pedants; in which much obscenity and absurdity are blended with learning, wit, and humour. Rabelais was a conscientious teacher of his people, and it was his pleasure to instruct the children of his parish in sacred music. His house was the resort of the learned; his purse was always open to the needy; and his medical skill was employed in the service of his parish.

RABENER, GOTTLIEB WILLIAM, a German satirist, born near Leipzic, in 1714, was educated for the legal profession, and obtained the office of comptroller of the taxes in the district of Leipzic. He died in 1771.

RABUTIN, ROGER, count de Bussy, a French wit and satirist, was born in 1616, at Epiry, in Nivernois. He entered the army at the age of twelve, under his father, and would probably have attained a high rank but for the offence he gave to persons in power by his scandalous lampoons. In 1665 he was sent to the Bastille for writing a libel, entitled "The Amorous History of the Gauls;" and on his release he was banished to his estate, where he remained till 1681, when he returned to court. His other works are, "Memoires," 2 vols.; and "Letters," 7 vols. Died, 1693.

RACAN, HONORAT DE BUEIL, marquis of, an eminent French poet, was born in 1569, at La Roche Racan; devoted himself to literature; and was one of the first members of the French Academy. Died, 1670. Besides his poems, he wrote "The Life of Malherbe," his friend and poetical instructor.

RACINE, BONAVENTURE, a French ecclesiastical historian, was born in 1708, at Chauny. He became head of the college at Rabastens; but being banished by the intrigues of the Jesuits, he retired to the college of Harcourt, and afterwards obtained a canonry in the cathedral of Auxerre, where he died in 1758. He wrote an "Ecclesiastical History," 13 vols.

RACINE, JOHN, an eminent French dramatic poet, was born at La Ferté Milon, in 1639; and was educated at Port Royal. He commenced his poetical career in 1660, by an Ode on the King's marriage, for which he was handsomely rewarded. In 1664 he produced his tragedy of "Thebaide," which was followed in 1666 by "Alexander." In 1668 appeared his "Andromache," which placed him far above all his contemporaries except Corneille; and his fame was still farther increased by the production of "Britannicus," "Berenice," and other tragedies. In 1677 appeared his tragedy of "Phædra," which was opposed by one on the same subject written by Pradon, which gave him great uneasiness; and owing to a base cabal that was formed against him, he was induced to desist from writing for the stage. After a lapse of twelve years he wrote, by desire of Louis XIV. and Madame de Maitenon, the sacred dramas of "Esther," and "Athalia," which were performed by the young ladies of her institution of St. Cyr. Besides his dramatic works, he wrote "Canticles or Hymns for the use of St. Cyr;" the "History of Port Royal," &c. In 1673 he was received into the academy, and continued to enjoy the highest favour at court; but having offended the king for having too freely used his pen in drawing up a memorial on the distresses of the people, he died of chagrin, in 1699.

RACINE, LOUIS, a son of the preceding, was born at Paris, in 1692, and educated under Rollin. He was eminent for talent, piety, and modesty; was made an inspector-general in the finance department; and died in 1763. Among his works are two poems, entitled "Grace," and "Religion;" "Epistles;" "Memoirs" of his father; and a translation of Milton's Paradise Lost.

RADCLIFFE, JOHN, an eminent physician, was born in 1650, at Wakefield, in Yorkshire, and was educated at the grammar-school there, and at University college, Oxford. Having obtained his medical degree, he settled in London in 1684, where he soon acquired great reputation, to which his ready wit and conversational powers contributed. In 1686 he was appointed physician to the princess Anne of Denmark, and, after the revolution, he was often consulted by king William III., whose favour he lost in consequence of the freedom with which he delivered his opinions when in attendance on his royal master. When Anne succeeded to the crown, Godolphin could not obtain for him the post of chief physician, as he had given her offence by telling her that her ailments were nothing but the vapours. But, though deprived of office, he was consulted in all cases of emergency, and received a large sum of secret service money for his prescriptions. Dr. Radcliffe left 40,000*l.* to the university of Oxford for the foundation of a public library of medical and philosophical science. Died, 1714.

RADCLIFFE, ANN, a celebrated novelist, whose maiden name was Ward, was born in London, in 1764; and in her twenty-third year was married to Mr. W. Radcliffe, proprietor and editor of the "English Chronicle." Soon after her marriage, Mrs. Radcliffe began to display the powers of her genius in works of imagination. Her first performance was a romantic tale, entitled "The Castles of Athlin and Dunblaine," in one volume; which was succeeded by "The Sicilian Romance," and "The Romance of the Forest," each in 2 vols.; but that which stamped the author's reputation, as the first novelist of the age, was the "Mysteries of Udolpho," in 4 vols., for which she received the sum of five hundred pounds. Her next performance was "The Italians." She also published a volume of "Travels through Holland and along the Rhine," in 1793. Mrs. Radcliffe possessed the art of exciting a high degree of interest in her narrative: her descriptive powers were of a superior order, especially in the delineation of scenes of terror, and in those aspects of nature which excite sentiment, and suggest melancholy associations. To quote the words of Mrs. Barbauld, "she seems to scorn to move those passions which form the interest of common novels: she alarms the soul with terror; agitates it with suspense, prolonged and wrought up to the most intense feeling by mysterious RAEBURN, Sir HENRY, an eminent portrait painter, was born in 1708, at Stockbridge, near Edinburgh; was apprenticed to a goldsmith, but turned his talents to painting, and acquired extensive popularity, being considered second only to Sir Thomas Lawrence. He received the honour of knighthood from George IV. when he visited Edinburgh; was appointed portrait-painter to the king in Scotland; and died in 1823.

RAFFENEL, CLAUDE DENIS, a French author, born in 1797, in the department of Jura. He was attached to the French consulate at Smyrna; went, in 1826, to Greece, and was killed at the siege of Athens in the following year. He wrote "Histoire Complète des Evénemens de la Grèce," and other works.

RAFFLES, Sir THOMAS STAMFORD, an eminent public functionary, was the son of a naval captain, and born at sea, off Jamaica, in 1781. He entered the India company's service early in life as a clerk in the home secretary's office; was appointed, in 1805, assistant secretary at Prince of Wales's Island; and, in 1811, became lieutenant governor of Java. There he remained till 1816; and during his administration of the government many judicial reforms were effected. In 1816 he was placed at the head of the factory at Bencoolen, in Sumatra, where he introduced many wise reforms, and eventually succeeded in establishing the settlement and free port of Singapore, in 1819. On his last visit to the island, in 1823, he laid the foundation of a college for the encouragement of Anglo-Chinese literature, with a library, museum, branch schools, &c.; but the impaired state of his health rendered it necessary that he should return to Europe; and he accordingly, in February, 1824, embarked, with his family, on board the Fame. On the evening of the same day, when about fifteen miles from Bencoolen, the vessel took fire, and all his valuable collections and manuscripts became a prey to the flames. The crew and passengers, in utter destitution, with difficulty saved their lives in the boats; and Sir Thomas, with his family, again embarked in April, and arrived in England in the following August. He survived this event only about two years, dying of apoplexy, at Highwood Hill, Middlesex, in July, 1826. His chief work is "The History of Java," 2 vols. 4to.

RAGHIB PACHA, MOHAMMED, grand vizir of the Ottoman empire, was born in 1702, and manifested, at an early period, such a decided taste for learning, that he acquired the name of Raghib, or the Student. In 1736 he was appointed secretary-general to the grand vizir; became reis effendi, a pacha of three tails, and successively, governor of Aidin, Aleppo, and Egypt. In 1757 he was elevated to the dignity of supreme vizir, and retained that dangerous post till his death, in 1766. He was one of the most enlightened ministers of the Turkish empire, and surpassed by none of his countrymen in literary talent.

RAGOIS, M. le, a French ecclesiastic of the 17th century, who was preceptor to the duke of Maine, natural son of Louis XIV., and the author of "L'Histoire de France, et l'Histoire Romaine."

RAGOTSKI, FRANCIS, prince of Transylvania, was born in 1676. Zealous for the independence of his country, he secretly entered into a negotiation with Louis XIV., which being betrayed, he was arrested, and found guilty of high treason. He had, however, the good fortune to escape; and receiving assurances of succour from France, he entered Hungary, and, by a manifesto, urged the people to free themselves from the tyranny of the Austrians. For a time he was eminently successful, and in 1704 he was proclaimed prince of Transylvania, and protector of Hungary. The crown of Poland, at that time vacant, was offered to him by the czar Peter, but he refused it; and his patriotic exertions being ultimately defeated by the Hungarian states entering into a treaty with the emperor, he renounced his estates, and withdrew into Turkey, where he died in 1735.

RAGUENET, FRANCIS, a native of Rouen, who, in 1689, gained a prize from the French academy, for a discourse, "Sur le Mérite et l'Utilité de Martyre." In 1704 he published "A Parallel of the Italians and French, in regard to Music and the Opera;" in which he gave the preference to the Italian music, and thereby highly offended his countrymen. He also wrote, "Les Monumens de Rome;" "Histoire d'Olivier Cromwell;" "Histoire de l'Ancien Testament;" and "Histoire du Vicomte de Turenne." Died, 1722.

RAIKES, ROBERT, a printer at Gloucester, who having realized a good property, employed it, with his pen and his influence, in acts of benevolence. Conjointly with Dr. Stock, he planned and instituted Sunday-schools. Born, 1735; died, 1811.

RAIMONDI, MARC ANTONIO, a celebrated engraver, born at Bologna, in 1748. After studying at Venice, he settled at Rome; was employed by Raphael to engrave several of his designs; and he soon formed a school there, which eclipsed those of Germany, and the Italian style of engraving became the standard of excellence. He was imprisoned by Clement VII. for having engraved a series of abominable designs in illustration of the Aretine verses, but procured his liberation, and was restored to favour by his exquisite "Martyrdom of St. Lawrence." Died, 1540.

RAIMONDI, JOHN BAPTIST, a celebrated Orientalist, born at Cremona, in Italy, about 1540. He passed several years in Asia, where he acquired a knowledge of the Arabic, Armenian, Syriac, and Hebrew languages. Returning to Italy, cardinal Ferdinand de' Medici made him director of the oriental press, whence originated the famous institution of the Propaganda.

RAINOLDS, JOHN, a learned divine, was born at Pinho, in Devonshire, in 1449; and became president of Corpus Christi college, Oxford. He was considered the leader of the puritan party, and distinguished himself greatly at the Hampton-court conference, in 1603, where he suggested the necessity of the present translation of the Bible, in which work he was afterwards engaged. Died, 1607.

RAKUBAH, or RAGUBAH, peishwah, or prince-regent, of the Mahrattas, acted an important part in the events which occurred in the East Indies from 1773 to 1782. Having usurped the sovereign power, to the prejudice of his nephew, he was deposed, and abandoned by all the Mahratta chiefs, when he fled to Bombay, and procured the protection of the English government. At length, peace taking place between the East India company and the Mahrattas, the cause of the peishwah was abandoned by the former; and from that time he sunk into obscurity.

RALEIGH, or RALEGH, Sir WALTER, a distinguished statesman, scholar, and warrior, in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I., was born in 1552, at Bodleigh, in Devonshire, and educated at Oriel college, Oxford. At the age of seventeen he made one of a troop of an hundred gentlemen volunteers, whom queen Elizabeth permitted to go to France, under the command of Henry Champernon, for the service of the Protestant princes. He next served in the Netherlands; and on his return from the continent, his half-brother, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, having obtained a grant of lands in North America, he engaged with a considerable number of gentlemen to go out to Newfoundland; but the expedition proving unsuccessful, Sir Walter returned to England, after being exposed to several dangers; and proceeded thence to Ireland, where he made his bravery so conspicuous in quelling the insurgents, that he was received at court with considerable favour, and obtained permission and supplies to prosecute his discoveries in America, which ended in his settling a colony in that country, called, in honour of his maiden sovereign, Virginia; and he is said to have first introduced tobacco and potatoes into Europe. In the mean time, the queen conferred on him the distinction of knighthood, and rewarded him by several lucrative grants, including a large share of the forfeited Irish estates. When his country's safety was threatened by the famous Spanish Armada, he raised and disciplined the militia of Cornwall; and afterwards, by joining the fleet with a squadron of ships belonging to gentlemen volunteers, assisted in obtaining the signal victory which it pleased Providence to give the English over the Spaniards on that occasion. He was now made gentleman of the privy chamber; but shortly after fell into disgrace, and was confined for some months, partly on account of a tract which he had published, entitled "The School for Atheists," which was unfairly construed by his enemies into a vindication of atheistical principles; and partly by a clandestine attachment to one of the queen's maids of honour, the daughter of Sir Nicholas Throckmorton; which lady, however, he afterwards honourably married. During his seclusion, he planned the discovery of the extensive country of Guiana, in South America, in which he took an active part himself, as soon as he was set at liberty; but the season being unfavourable, he returned to England, and was soon after appointed to a command in the important expedition to Cadiz, of which the success was in a great measure owing to Sir Walter's valour and prudence. This, joined to several other important services, restored him completely to the favour of Elizabeth towards the end of her reign. Her successor, James, prejudiced against him by the earl of Essex, disapproving of his martial spirit, and jealous of his abilities, availed himself of a court conspiracy against this great man, charging him with participating in an attempt to place upon the throne Arabella Stuart, and of carrying on a secret correspondence with the king of Spain. By the base subservience of the jury, he was brought in guilty of high treason, even to the surprise of the attorney-general, Coke himself, who declared that he had only charged him with misprision of treason. Raleigh was relieved, and committed to the Tower, where his wife, at her earnest solicitation, was allowed to reside with him, and where his youngest son was born. Twelve years was Sir Walter detained a prisoner in the Tower; during which time, besides various minor compositions, he wrote his "History of the World;" a work distinguished for the richness of its information, the judiciousness of its reflections, and the vigour of its style. At length his release was obtained, in 1616, by the advance of a large sum of money to the new favourite, Villiers; and, to retrieve his broken fortunes, he planned another expedition to America. He obtained a patent under the great seal for making a settlement in Guiana; but, in order to retain a power over him, the king did not grant him a pardon for the sentence passed upon him for his alleged treason. Having reached the Orinoco, he despatched a portion of his force to attack the new Spanish settlement of St. Thomas, which was captured; but he had to lament the death of his eldest son, who fell on that occasion. The expected plunder proved of little value; and Sir Walter, having in vain tried to induce his captains to attack other Spanish settlements, arrived at Plymouth in July, 1618. Being brought before the court of King's Bench, his plea of an implied pardon by his subsequent command was overruled; and, the doom of death being pronounced against him, it was carried into execution the following day, Oct. 29, 1618, in Old Palace-yard. His behaviour at the scaffold was calm, and, after addressing the people at some length in his own justification, he received the stroke of death with perfect composure; remarking to the sheriff with a smile, as he felt the edge of the axe, "This is a sharp medicine, but it is a physician that will cure all diseases."

RALPH, JAMES, a miscellaneous writer, was born at Philadelphia; came to England in 1726; became a political writer; obtained a pension; and died in 1767. Among his works are, "A History of England," "The Use and Abuse of Parliaments;" "The Case of Authors by Profession;" and "Night," a poem, which last production procured him a niche in the "Dunciad."

RAMBERG, JOHN HENRY, an eminent draughtsman and engraver, was born in 1707, in Hanover; studied under Sir Joshua Reynolds; and after visiting Italy, was appointed, in 1790, painter to the court of Hanover. He produced an immense number of paintings and etchings, and particularly excelled in caricature.

RAMEAU, JEAN PHILIPPE, an eminent French composer and writer on music, was born, in 1683, at Dijon, and studied in Italy. He did not produce his first opera, "Hippolite and Aricie," till he was in his fiftieth year; but he subsequently brought out many others, by which he acquired high reputation. He also wrote various excellent works on music, of which the chief is "A Treatise on Harmony." Died, 1767.

RAMEL, JOHN PETER, born at Cahors, in 1770, was chief of a battalion in the army of the Pyrenees in 1794, when he incurred the hatred of the Jacobins, and narrowly escaped falling a sacrifice to their vengeance. Being one of the victims to the revolution of the 18th Fructidor, he was banished with fifteen more persons to Cayenne, whence Ramel, Pichegru, Barthelemy, Willot, and others, made their escape. In June, 1798, to the Dutch colony of Surinam. After the elevation of Buonaparte to power, Ramel returned to France, and entering into active service, made many campaigns. In 1814 he was made a major-general, and in 1815 appointed commandant at Toulouse. He retained that post after the second restoration of Louis XVIII., and he exerted himself to establish tranquillity among the inhabitants; but having endeavoured to disarm the companies of Vendets, whose existence was not authorized by the government, he became all at once the object of public displeasure, and was assassinated by a band of ruffians, who rushed into his hotel, August, 1815.

RAMELLI, AUGUSTIN, an ingenious mechanic and engineer, was born at Milan, about 1531, and distinguished himself by his attention to mathematical studies. Having adopted the military profession, he signalized himself on several occasions in the armies of the emperor Charles V., and afterwards going to France he was well received by the duke of Anjou, who made him his engineer, and subsequently bestowed on him a considerable pension. He was the author of a rare and curious work, entitled "Le Diverse ed Artificiose Machine." Died, 1590.

RAMLER, CHARLES WILLIAM, a German poet and miscellaneous writer, was born in 1723, at Kolberg. He became teacher of the belles lettres at Berlin; where his "Lyrical Anthology" procured him the name of the German Horace; but though he did much to polish German versification, he was far below his model. He also composed oratorios, and translated some works into his native language. Died, 1798.

RAMMOHUN ROY, Rajah, by birth a Brahmin, and a man of the most enlightened mind, was born about the year 1776, at Borduan, in the province of Bengal. His father gave him a good education, and trained him in the doctrine of his sect; but the son observing the diversities of opinion that existed on religion, not only among Mussulmans and Christians, but even among his Hindoo brethren, he determined on leaving his paternal home, for the purpose of investigating a subject on which he felt such deep and paramount interest. For a time he sojourned at Thibet; and on his return to Hindostan he devoted himself to the study of the Sanscrit and other languages; after which he was employed by the East India company as principal native officer in the collection of the revenues in the district of Borduan. On the death of his father, in 1803, he appears to have commenced his plans of reforming the religion of his countrymen; and, on removing to Moorsheadabad, he published, in Persian, a work, entitled "Against the Idolatry of all Religions." This raised up against him a host of enemies, and in 1814 he retired to Calcutta, where he diligently applied himself to the study of the English language. He afterwards translated from the Sanscrit into the Bengalee and Hindostanee languages the "Vedant," the principal book of Hindoo theology; and prefixed to some chapters of the Veds, which he afterwards published, is a letter containing the following sentence: "The consequence of my long and uninterrupted researches into religious truth has been, that I have found the doctrines of Christ more conducive to moral principles, and better adapted for the use of rational beings, than any other which have come to my knowledge." In this spirit, having acquired a knowledge of Greek and Hebrew, that he might be competent to study the original Scriptures for himself, he published, in English, Sanscrit, and Bengalee, a series of selections from the Gospel, entitled, "The Precepts of Jesus the Guide to Peace and Happiness;" which being animadverted upon by Dr. Marsham, of Serampore college, the learned Hindoo published his "Second Appeal," and on this being replied to by the doctor, a "Final Appeal" appeared. During his residence at Calcutta, Rammohun Roy connected himself with the periodical press, and he was at different times the proprietor and conductor of newspapers printed in the native languages. In April, 1831, the Rajah, accompanied by his youngest son, arrived in England, where he was received with every mark of distinction and respect. In every kind of assemblage, religious, political, literary, and social, the amenity of his manners, his distinguished attainments, and his universal philanthropy, rendered him a welcome guest; and his advice was sought by ministers on topics connected with the future government of India. He did not, however, live to carry into effect the various plans for improving the condition of his countrymen whose welfare he had so much at heart, having been taken ill while on a visit at Bristol, where he expired in October, 1833.

RAMOND DE CARBONNIERES, LOUIS FRANCIS ELIZABETH, baron, who acquired considerable reputation as a philosopher and geologist, was born at Strasburg, in 1753. At the beginning of the Revolution he belonged to the household troops; and when, in 1771, he was chosen a deputy from Paris to the Legislative Assembly, he appeared there as a zealous defender of the monarchical government. During Robespierre's domination he was an exile; but he subsequently obtained the prefecture of Puy-de-Dôme, and he became, in 1818, councillor of state extraordinary. He published "Observations faites dans les Pyrénées," 2 vols., and other works. Died, 1827.

RAMSAY, ANDREW MICHAEL, better known as the Chevalier Ramsay, was born at Ayr, in Scotland, in 1686. He was educated at Edinburgh; visited Fenelon, at Cambrai, and being received into his house as an inmate, the good prelate made a convert of him to the Catholic religion, and procured him the appointment of tutor to the duke de Chateau, Thierry, and the prince de Turenne. He next went to Rome, to educate the children of the chevalier St. George, commonly called the Pretender; and on quitting that situation, he returned to Scotland, and resided in the family of the duke of Argyll. His principal works are, "Discours sur le Poeme Epique," prefixed to Telemachus; "Les Voyages de Cyrus," 2 vols.; "Philosophical Principles of Religion," 2 vols; and the Lives of Fenelon and Turenne. Died, 1743.

RAMSAY, ALLAN, an eminent Scotch poet, was born at Leadhills, in 1685. He served his apprenticeship to a wig-maker, which trade he followed for a time, and then became a bookseller at Edinburgh, where, in 1731, he published a quarto volume of his poems, which were so well received, that he was encouraged to print another in 1738. The principal piece in the last collection is the celebrated pastoral, called "The Gentle Shepherd." His poems and fables rendered him in the highest degree popular; and while he acquired fame by his talents, he amassed a fortune by his trade; his acquaintance was courted by many distinguished individuals, and his shop became the common resort of the literary characters and wits of Edinburgh. Died, 1758.—His son, ALLAN, was an eminent portrait painter; and wrote the "Investigator," and "The Present State of the Arts in England." Born, 1709; died, 1764.

RAMSAY, DAVID, an eminent American physician and historian, was born in 1749; studied medicine in Philadelphia; and practised at Charleston, South Carolina, where he soon acquired celebrity. From 1776 to 1785 he distinguished himself in a political capacity, first as a member of the legislature of South Carolina, and afterwards as a member of congress. He laboured zealously with his pen to promote the independence of his country; and among his publications are, "The History of the American Revolution;" "The Life of Washington;" and "The History of South Carolina." But his most important work appeared after his death, and consisted of a series of historical volumes, entitled "Universal History Americanized, or an Historical View of the World, from the earliest Records to the Nineteenth Century," &c. 12 vols. 8vo. He died May 8, 1815, in consequence of wounds received two days previous from the pistol of a maniac, who fired at him when close to his own dwelling.

RAMSDEN, JESSE, an eminent optician and mathematical instrument maker, was born at Halifax, in Yorkshire, in 1735. He was brought up as a hot-presser; and afterwards studied engraving. He next became a mathematical instrument-maker in Piccadilly, and, marrying the daughter of Mr. Dollond, the optician, he adopted the same business as his father-in-law. Among other discoveries made by him, was one for an accurate division of instruments, which procured him a premium from the board of longitude. His mural quadrants also are in high estimation. Died, 1800.

RAMUS, or LA RAMEE, PETER, a French philosopher, was born in a village of the Vermandois, in 1515. When a boy, he obtained the place of servant in the college of Navarre, where he devoted his leisure hours to study, and became a most consummate scholar. Having ventured to attack the doctrine of Aristotle, he was interdicted from teaching philosophy; but this judgment was reversed by Henry II., and in 1551 he was made royal professor of rhetoric and philosophy. His spirit of free inquiry ultimately led him to become a Protestant; and as this could not be long concealed; he was obliged to leave Paris; to which city he returned in 1571, and lost his life in the massacre on St. Bartholomew's day, in the following year. His works on mathematics, philosophy, logic, &c. are numerous.

RANCE, ARMAND JOHN LE BOUTILLIER DE, the reformer of La Trappe, was born in 1626, at Paris, and adopted the ecclesiastical profession. He obtained several benefices before he was in orders, acquired great celebrity as a preacher, and might have risen to the most elevated stations in the church, had he not taken the resolution of retiring from the world. Various reasons are assigned for this; the most probable of which appears to be, that although he was a man of large fortune, and indulged in all the pleasures of the world, the death of the duchess of Montauban, to whom he was attached, produced such a revulsion in his feelings, that he abandoned society, and retired to his abbey of La Trappe, where he introduced a reform of the most rigid kind in the monastic discipline. He was the author of several theological works; and died in 1700.

RANDOLPH, SIR THOMAS, an eminent statesman, was born in Kent, in 1592, and died in 1630. On the accession of Elizabeth he was sent on embassies to Scotland, France, and Russia. His letters are in different collections, and his account of Russia in Hackluyt's Voyages.

RANDOLPH, THOMAS, an English dramatic poet; born 1603; died, 1634. His "Musc's Looking Glass," a comedy, is well known, and much admired.

RANDOLPH, THOMAS, a learned divine, was the son of the recorder of Canterbury, where he was born in 1701, and educated at the King's school. After studying at Oxford, and obtaining his degree of D.D., he received church preferment in his native county, and became, in 1763, archdeacon of Oxford, and Margaret professor of divinity. Among his works are, "The Christian's Faith;" "A Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity;" and "A View of Our Blessed Saviour's Ministry." Died, 1783.

RANDOLPH, JOHN, a learned prelate, a son of the preceding, was born in 1749; studied at Christchurch, Oxford, where he graduated, and in 1783 was elected to the regius professorship of divinity. He became, successively, bishop of Oxford, Bangor, and London; but he did not enjoy the latter diocese more than two years, having died of apoplexy in 1813. Though austere in his manners, Dr. Randolph was distinguished by the real benevolence of his disposition, as much as by the soundness of his abilities, and the firmness he displayed in the regulation of his diocese. He was the author of "Prælectio de Lingua Græcæ Studio," &c.; "Sylloge Confessionum;" "Concilio ad Clerum," &c.

RANTZAU, JOSEPH, count de, a French marshal in the 16th century, was descended from an illustrious family in Holstein, and entered when young into the Swedish army. In 1635 he went to France with the chancellor Oxenstiern; and Louis XIII. being pleased with his agreeable manners, he made him a major-general, and gave him the command of two regiments. He served under the duke of Orleans and the great Condé, with high reputation; rose to the rank of a marshal; completed the conquest of Flanders; and was made governor of Dunkirk in 1646; but becoming an object of suspicion to cardinal Mazarin, he was confined eleven months in the Bastille, and died soon after his liberation, in 1650. During his different campaigns he was so often severely wounded, that at last he had but one eye, one ear, one arm, and one leg.

RAPHAEL, or RAFFAELLO SANZIO, DA URBINO, the most celebrated of modern painters, was born at Urbino, in 1483, being the son of a painter named Sanzio. At the age of thirteen his father placed him under Perugino, where he soon surpassed his numerous compeers. Three years afterwards he went with Pinturicchio to Siena, to assist him in painting the history of Pius II., for the cathedral there; but Raphael soon left that work to visit Florence, where he improved his style by studying the designs of Da Vinci and Michael Angelo. His favourite artist, however, was Fra Bartolomeo, who gave him a more correct knowledge of colouring. In 1508 he was invited to Rome by Julius II., who employed him to paint the "School of Athens," in the Vatican. In performing this commission, he gave such satisfaction, that the pope ordered all the pictures, already painted in the various rooms, to be obliterated, and the walls prepared for the productions of Raphael alone, who, with difficulty, succeeded in saving from destruction a ceiling, painted by his old master Perugino. On the accession of Leo X. he prosecuted his labours with increased spirit, and executed his "Attila," and the "Deliverance of St. Peter." The "Cartoons," and the "Transfiguration," were among the last of his labours. To his other talents he added that of being an able architect; the principles of which science he studied under Bramante, who recommended him for his successor in conducting the great work of St. Peter's; the general plan of which, as it now stands, was designed by Raphael. He likewise constructed a number of magnificent buildings, particularly the Caffarelli palace at Rome. As a sculptor also he evinced great skill, though in that department of art he was able to pay but little attention. He died in 1520, at the age of 37 years.

RAPIN DE THOYRAS, PAUL, an historian, was born in 1661, at Castres, in Languedoc. He studied law under his father, who was an advocate, until the revocation of the edict of Nantes drove him to England, and subsequently to Holland, where he entered a company of French cadets. In 1689 he followed the prince of Orange into England, and distinguished himself at the battle of the Boyne, and the siege of Limerick. In 1707 he settled at Wesel, in the duchy of Cleves, and devoted himself to the composition of his "History of England," which was published at the Hague in 10 vols. 4to., and was for a long time in great repute, being the only complete narrative of English events. Died, 1725.

RAPIN, NICHOLAS, a French poet, was born at Fontenai-le-compte, in Poictou, in 1535, and died in 1609. The principal of his French poems, entitled "Les Plaisirs du Gentilhomme Champêtre," and his Latin epigrams, are much admired.

RAPIN, RENATUS, a French jesuit and critic, famous for his skill in classical learning. Born, 1621; died, 1687.

RAPP, JOHN, count de, a French general, was born at Colmar, in Alsace, in 1772. He attracted notice by his skill and bravery in the early progress of the revolutionary wars; was aid-de-camp to general Desaix during his campaigns in Germany and Egypt; and filled the same situation under Buonaparte when first consul. In 1802 he was employed in the subjugation of Switzerland; defeated the Russian imperial guard, and took prince Repnin prisoner, at the battle of Austerlitz; was appointed governor of Dantzic in 1807; and after the retreat of the French army, he defended the city with consummate ability and valour, till he was compelled by famine to capitulate. Returning to France in 1814, he was received with distinction by Louis XVIII.; but joined Napoleon on his return from Elba. He was, however, again taken into favour by the king, and died, lieutenant-general of the cavalry, in 1821.

RASTALL, JOHN, a learned printer in London, who wrote a "Dramatic Description of Asia, Africa, and Europe;" "Canones Astrologici;" "Dialogues concerning Purgatory;" "Anglorum Regum Chronicon," &c. He married a sister of Sir Thomas More, and died in 1536.

RASORI, JOHN, an eminent Italian physician, was born in 1767, at Parma; became professor of pathology at Pavia; was employed in his medical capacity by the vice-regal government; was imprisoned by the Austrians as one of the Carbonari; and died in 1824.

RAS-WELLETA-SELASSE, viceroy of Tigré, in Abyssinia, born about 1746, was a statesman whose superior abilities and enlightened views gave him an exalted character among the semi-barbarians over whom he ruled. Died, 1816.

RATCLIFFE, THOMAS, earl of Sussex, who died in 1583, went as ambassador to Charles V. to negotiate the marriage between queen Mary and Philip of Spain. On his return he was made lord deputy of Ireland, and chief justice of the forests north of Trent; and in the succeeding reign he was appointed to the office of lord chamberlain.

RATTE, ETIENNE HYACINTHE DE, an astronomer, was born at Montpellier, in 1722. He was secretary to the Academy of Sciences in his native city; also counsellor to the court of aids; and when the National Institute was formed, he was chosen an associate. De Ratte made important observations on the transit of Venus in 1761, and furnished many articles on natural philosophy to the Dictionnaire Encyclopédique, &c. Died, 1803.

RAULIN, JOHN, a celebrated French preacher, of the 15th century, whose sermons and letters were greatly admired, and to whom both Rabelais and La Fontaine have been partially indebted for their pithos. Born, 1443; died, 1514.

RAULIN, JOSEPH, an ingenious French physician, was born in 1708, and died at Paris in 1784. He wrote several medical treatises, and was regarded as a practitioner of great knowledge and experience.

RAUWOLF, LEONARD, a distinguished German botanist, and physician who travelled through Syria, Palestine, Egypt, &c., making many valuable observations in natural history. He was a native of Augsburg; became a physician in the Austrian army; and died in 1606.

RAVAILLAC, FRANCIS, the murderer of Henry IV. of France, was born at Angoulême, in 1578. Having been ruined by a lawsuit, and for a long time confined in prison for debt, his naturally gloomy disposition degenerated into a morbid fanaticism; and he became accustomed to consider the good and humane Henry IV. as the arch-enemy of the church, to destroy whom would be doing God's service. Filled with this notion, he followed the royal carriage from the Louvre to the Rue de la Ferrière, and while it stopped in the street, in consequence of some obstruction, he mounted the coach-wheel, and thrusting his hand in at the window, armed with a knife, stabbed the king to the heart. He was instantly seized, interrogated, and underwent the torture; but he declared he had no accomplice; and on May 27, 1610, his limbs were torn asunder by horses.

RAVENET, SIMON FRANCIS, a French engraver, who came to England about 1730, and executed many large historical prints in an excellent style. Died, 1774.

RAVENSCHROFT, THOMAS, an English musician, whose collections of psalm tunes, songs, &c. were at one time in high repute. Died, 1640.

RAVIUS, or RAU, CHRISTIAN, a learned German professor, was born at Berlin, in 1613. Coming to England, and being an admirable orientalist, he was patronized by archbishop Usher, who sent him on a voyage to the East for the purpose of procuring manuscripts. He afterwards resided at Utrecht, Upsal, Kiel, &c., where he read lectures in Arabic, and wrote several useful treatises on Hebrew, Samaritan, and other Eastern literature. Died, 1677.

RAWLEY, WILLIAM, an English divine, was chaplain and secretary to Bacon, lord Verulam; and to him we are indebted for collecting many of his patron's excellent works. He held the living of Sandbeach, in Cambridgeshire; and died in 1667.

RAWLINSON, CHRISTOPHER, an able scholar, was born in Lancashire, in 1677, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he was distinguished by his knowledge of the Saxon language. He published an edition of king Alfred's translation of "Boethius de Consolatione Philosophiæ;" and died in 1733.

RAWLINSON, SIR THOMAS, lord mayor of London, of which city he was a native. He beautified and repaired Guildhall; and died in 1721.

RAWLINSON, THOMAS, eldest son of the preceding, was a remarkable collector of books, of which he had so great a number, as to be obliged to take London-houses, in Aldersgate-street, to contain them. After his death, which occurred in 1728, his library was disposed of by auction, and the sale of the manuscripts alone occupied sixteen days. His bibliomane propensity induced Addison to designate him, in the Tatler, as "Tom Folio."

RAWLINSON, DR. RICHARD, the fourth son of Sir Thomas, was an eminent antiquary and topographer. He was educated at St. John's college, Oxford, and founded in that university an Anglo-Saxon lecture-ship. He wrote "The English Topographer;" and translated "Du Fresnoy's Method of Studying History," 2 vols. Died, 1735.

RAWSON, SIR WILLIAM, a celebrated oculist, whose family name was Adams, was a native of Cornwall, and was apprenticed to a surgeon at Barnstaple, in Devonshire. He subsequently devoted his attention to the cure of diseases of the eyes, and especially cataract; was appointed oculist to ophthalmic institutions at Bath and Exeter; and, removing to the metropolis, became a member of the Royal College of Surgeons, and oculist extraordinary to the prince regent, &c. He received the honour of knighthood for his professional skill; and took the name of Rawson, in consequence of the will of a person from whom he received a considerable bequest of property. Died, 1822.

lished an account in 1673. Mr. Ray was elected a fellow of the Royal Society in 1667; and the transactions of that body afforded ample proofs of his attention to science. His works were numerous and valuable. The principal are, a "Collection of English Proverbs;" "The Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation;" "Three Discourses concerning the Chaos, Deluge, and Dissolution of the World;" "Synopsis Methodica Animalium Quadrupedum;" and "Sylloge Stirpium Europæarum extra Britanniam." Died, 1705.

RAY DE ST. GENIEZ, JACQUES MARIE, a French officer, and the author of several works on military affairs. He was born in 1712; served with distinction in Italy and Germany; and died in 1777.

RAYMOND, ROBERT, lord, an eminent judge, was the son of Sir Thomas Raymond, one of the justices of the King's Bench, and author of "Reports." He became solicitor-general in the reign of queen Anne, and was attorney-general in that of George I.; who appointed him one of the commissioners of the great seal, and afterwards chief justice of the King's Bench. In 1730 he was created baron Raymond; and died in 1732.

RAYNAL, WILLIAM THOMAS FRANCIS, an eminent French historian and philosopher, was born at St. Genies, in 1718; and after quitting the Jesuits, by whom he was educated, he became an historical and political writer. He joined the French philosophical party, as it was called, adopted their principles to the fullest extent, and became one of the writers in the Encyclopædia. He also published several works at Paris; the principal of which was his "Political and Philosophical History of the European Settlements in the East and West Indies." This was followed by an essay on the "Revolution of America," written in a style of declamation, and full of enmity to the English. In 1791 the abbé Raynal addressed a letter to the constituent assembly, in defence of the rights of property, which greatly irritated the revolutionists; and though he escaped the tyranny of Robespierre, he was stripped of his property, and died in great indigence, at Passy, in 1796. Among his other works are, a "History of the Stadtholdership," 2 vols.; "History of the Parliament of England," 2 vols.; "Historical Anecdotes," 3 vols.; "History of the Divorce of Henry VIII. of England;" "The Military School," 3 vols.; and "Historical Memoirs of Europe," 3 vols.

RAYNOUARD, M., an eminent philologist, was born at Brignole, in Provence, in 1761. Until he was near forty years of age, he practised as an advocate; when, having fortunately attained an honourable independence, he determined to gratify his love of literature by steadily pursuing it; but the events of the revolution forced him to take a part in public affairs; and in 1791 he was nominated a member of the Legislative Assembly. Shortly after, being undeceived in the favourable opinion he had formed of its tendencies, he attempted to escape, but was thrown into prison, and did not recover his liberty until after the 9th Thermidor. In 1806 he was summoned to the Corps Legislatif, by the department du Var, where his name and exalted qualities were generally known. Being retained, in 1815, on the list of the members of the Académie Française, he obtained the honour of being enrolled also in the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres; and, in 1817, he succeeded Sicard as perpetual secretary. In his "Observations Philologiques sur le Roman de Rou," he demonstrated grammatical rules before unknown, and the discovery of which has greatly facilitated the progress of subsequent students of the remains of ancient French literature. In several articles in the Journal des Savans commencing in 1816, he reviewed nearly all the publications which treat on this subject, and has there thrown great light on many questions. But his great work, "Glossaire compare de la Langue des Troubadours," was only in part finished when he died in 1836.

RE, PHILIP, an eminent Italian agriculturalist, was born at Reggio, in 1763. He studied in the college of his native city, and in 1793 an agricultural professorship was founded there in his favour. In 1803 he was called to the professorial chair at Bologna; and on the re-organization of the university of Modena, in 1814, he became professor of agriculture and botany, to which was added the superintendence of the royal gardens. He published several excellent works on his favourite study; and died in 1817.

READ, ALEXANDER, a physician, was a native of Scotland, and a man of abilities. In 1620 he was created doctor of physic at Oxford, by royal mandate; wrote several professional works; and died about 1680.

REAL, GASPARD DE, Seigneur de CURBAN, was born at Sisteron, in 1682, and died at Paris, in 1752. He wrote an able work on the "Science of Government," in 8 vols., and was regarded as one of the most enlightened politicians of his time.

REAMUR, RENE ANTOINE FERCHAULT DE, a philosophic naturalist, was born in 1683, at Rochelle; studied under the Jesuits at Poitiers; and afterwards went through a course of law at Bourges. But his tastes led him to the observation of nature; and, having made himself acquainted with the mathematical sciences, he was chosen a member of the academy of sciences at Paris, to which he had presented some memoirs on geometry. He discovered the art of manufacturing porcelain; of converting iron into steel; of tinning iron plates; and of making artificial pearls. He ascertained, also, the existence of mines of turquoises in France equal to those of Persia; and he invented a method of hatching eggs by artificial heat. But he is principally celebrated for being the first who reduced thermometers to a common standard; and the instruments constructed upon his principles still go by his name. His chief works are, "Memoirs of his Discoveries;" "The History of Insects," 6 vols.; and a "History of the Auriferous Rivers of France."

a Spanish soldier, writer, and diplomatist, was born at Leon, in 1597, and died at Madrid, in 1677. He rendered important services to his country, and added to his fame by his literary labours. His poetical productions form 4 vols.

REDI, FRANCIS, an Italian physician and naturalist, was born at Arezzo, in 1626, and became first physician to the grand duke of Tuscany. He distinguished himself as a man of science, by his experiments on the poison of the viper and the generation of insects. Redi was also a good poet, and cultivated the belles lettres with such success, that the academy Della Crusca, when compiling their dictionary, were proud of his assistance. Died, 1698.

REDING, ALORS, baron Von, landammann and general of the Swiss, was born in 1755. On the invasion of Switzerland by the French, in 1798, he commanded the troops raised to repel them; but though he obtained some advantages over the enemy, his forces were inadequate to the task assigned them, and the Swiss were compelled to submission. Having afterwards endeavoured to secure some degree of independence for his country, Buonaparte had him arrested and confined in the fortress of Arbourg; but he was set at liberty in a few months. He was subsequently at no pains to conceal his antipathy to Buonaparte; and he is believed to have favoured the passage of the allied troops through the Swiss territories over the Rhine, after the campaign of 1813. Died, 1818.

REDMAYNE, JOHN, a learned divine, born in Yorkshire, in 1499, was archdeacon of Taunton, and a prebendary of Wells and Westminster. He wrote some theological works, and was one of the compilers of the English liturgy. Died, 1551.

REED, JOSEPH, a dramatic writer, was born at Stockton-upon-Tees, in 1743, and carried on business as a rope-maker at Stepney, till his death, in 1767. He was the author of "Dido," a tragedy; "Tom Jones," a comic opera; several farces, &c.

REED, ISAAC, a critic and miscellaneous writer, was born in London, in 1742, and brought up to the conveyancing business, which he relinquished for literary pursuits. He published the poems of lady Mary Wortley Montagu; edited the Seatonian prize poems; and revised and enlarged Dodsley's "Old Plays." He afterwards also published the "Biographia Dramatica," 2 vols.; and four volumes of humorous pieces, under the title of the "Repository;" but the work by which he is most advantageously known is an edition of Shakespeare, in 10 vols., which he extended, afterwards, to 21 vols., embodying in its pages all the most valuable notes and elucidations of former commentators, with much original information. He was also a great book collector, in which he displayed considerable judgment and perseverance. At his death, in 1807, his library was sold by auction, and it took thirty-nine days to dispose of it.

REES, ABRAHAM, D.D., a dissenting minister, whose labours as an encyclopædist have gained for him great and deserved celebrity, was born in Montgomeryshire, in 1743. Being intended for the ministry, he was educated at Mr. Coward's academy, at Hoxton. On the death of Dr. Jennings, in 1762, though Mr. Rees was only nineteen years of age, he was appointed mathematical tutor of that institution, which office he filled till the academy was dissolved, in 1784. Soon after this, he became theological and philosophical tutor in the new college, founded at Hackney, which place he held till 1785, when that establishment also terminated. In 1776 he was employed as editor of "Chambers's Cyclopædia," which he completed in 1786, in four vols. folio. After a lapse of fourteen years, the proprietors embarked in a more comprehensive undertaking, which also Dr. Rees brought to a conclusion in 45 vols. 4to. Besides these great literary performances, he published two volumes of "Practical Sermons," and several other works. It was at the express recommendation of Robertson, the historian, that Dr. Rees obtained his degree from the university of Edinburgh. He officiated more than forty years as minister of the congregation in the Old Jewry; was a fellow of the Royal Society, and other institutions; and died in 1825.

REEVE, CLARA, a novelist, was born at Ipswich, in 1723, and was the daughter of a clergyman, who gave her an excellent education. She possessed great learning and research, which she displayed in her first literary essay—a translation of Barclay's "Argenis." Among her subsequent productions are, "The Progress of Romance;" "Memoirs of Sir Roger de Clarendon," 4 vols.; "The School for Widows;" and the well-known tale of "The Old English Baron." Died, 1808.

REEVE, JOHN, a celebrated comic actor, (for many years the focus of attraction at the Adelphi theatre, in the Strand, and whose matchless representation of barlesque characters will long be remembered), was born in London, in 1799; made his first appearance on the boards of Drury-lane, as "Sylvester Daggerwood," in 1819; was subsequently engaged at the Haymarket, English Opera-house, and Adelphi; and died, aged 38, in January, 1838. John Reeve was the absolute personification of hilarious jollity and genuine good-humour; and was as much beloved by his private friends for his frank and generous disposition, as he was admired by the public for his facetious drollery.

REEVES, JOHN, the founder of the celebrated association for protecting liberty and property against republicans and levelers, was born in 1732, and died in 1829. This gentleman was called to the bar in 1780, but discontinued the active practice of his profession, and was deputed by government to regulate the administration of justice in Newfoundland; for which purpose he made two voyages there. Soon after his return from the first, he published "The History of the Law of Shipping and Navigation," a work that proved highly useful. But having, in 1795, published a pamphlet, entitled "Thoughts on the English Government," in which an alleged libellous passage appeared, the author was prosecuted by order of the House of Commons, and underwent his trial at Guildhall, when he was acquitted. He was appointed one of the king's printers in 1799; and from 1803 to 1814 he had an appointment in the alien office.

REGA, HENRY JOSEPH, a benevolent physician of Louvain, where he was born in 1800. He was no less distinguished by his talents, than by the zeal with which he consecrated his time and fortune to the consolation and relief of the afflicted. He was the author of "De Lymphathia," &c. Died, 1754.

REGGIO, CHARLES NICHOLAS OUDINOT, duke de, marshal of France, was the son of a merchant, and born in 1767. He entered the army early, and in 1791 was captain of the third battalion of volunteers who served in the department of the Meuse. Distinguishing himself by his courage and military skill, he attained the rank of general of division, and was placed on the staff in Massena's army, whom he accompanied into Italy in 1799, and by his courageous conduct, during the siege of Genoa, in going twice through the English fleet to communicate with general Suchet, saved the French troops from becoming the victims of famine. In 1800 he joined general Brune's army in Italy, where he gained fresh laurels in forcing the Austrians to repass the Adige; and when war again broke out between France and Austria, in 1805, Napoleon confided an honourable station to general Oudinot, who appeared covered with glory in the field of Austerlitz. In 1806 he was sent to take possession of Neufchatel, where Oudinot conducted himself with so much disinterestedness as to gain the esteem of its inhabitants, who, in token thereof, presented him with the freedom of their city. He assisted at the siege of Dantzic; and after the battle of Wagram, Napoleon made him marshal of the empire, and created him duke of Reggio. In 1810 he went to Holland to take possession of the throne, which Louis Bonaparte had quitted in disgust. He afterwards shared in the disastrous invasion of Russia, and was there seriously wounded. In 1814 he was again called into action, and again was distinguished for his courage, his great military talents, and a conduct that was never tarnished by the slightest accusation of inhumanity. On the capitulation of Paris, March 31, 1814, the duke agreed to the determination of the provisional government, and did not see Napoleon after that day. He was graciously received by Louis XVIII., and from that hour devoted his services to his sovereign. On the return of Napoleon from Elba, he placed himself at the head of the grenadiers; but finding it impossible to secure their fidelity to the cause of Louis, he retired to his seat at Montmorency. He subsequently received the command of the national guard at Paris; was made a peer of France and a minister of state; and during the war with Spain, in 1823, he entered Madrid, of which he retained the situation of governor a few months, and then returned to Paris.

REGIS, PIERRE SYLVAIN, a French philosopher, was born at Agenois, in 1632. After studying in the Sorbonne, he read lectures upon and espoused the Cartesian philosophy, till interdicted from doing so by the royal mandate. He, however, published an elaborate view of that system, in 3 vols. 4to.; and wrote several defences of it, in answer to Huet, Du Hamel, and others. Died, 1707.

REGIS, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French jesuit, who went as a missionary to China. He was distinguished for his skill in geography, and drew up for the use of his brethren a general map and description of the Chinese empire. He took part in the discussions of the missionaries with the emperor Young-tching, in 1724, concerning the proscription of the Christian religion in China; but the date of his death is not recorded.

REGIUS, URSAN, or LE ROI, a learned poet and controversialist, distinguished also as one of the early reformers, was born at Langenargen, in Germany. He completed his studies at Ingoldstadt, under Eckius; and when the emperor Maximilian visited that university, he made Regius his poet-laureat and orator. He afterwards obtained a professorship; but when the controversy arose between Luther and Eckius, the reformed doctrines operated so strongly upon his conviction, that he sided with the former against his old tutor in polemics. In 1530 he accepted an invitation from the duke of Brunswick to settle as pastor of the church of Lunenburg; and died in 1541.

REGNARD, JOHN FRANCIS, a comic writer, was born at Paris, in 1655. He went to Italy about 1676, and was returning home with considerable property, when he was captured by an Algerine corsair, and sold for a slave. During his captivity, he obtained the favour of his master by his skill in cookery; but being caught in an intrigue with one of the women, he was required to turn Mahometan, or suffer death. The French consul, however, saved him by paying his ransom; and Regnard returned to France about 1681. After this he wrote a number of successful comedies, besides poems, and other works; was made a treasurer of France, and lieutenant of the waters and forests; and died in 1709.

REGNAULT, NOEL, a learned mathematician and philosopher, was born at Arras, in 1653; belonged to the society of Jesuits; and died at Paris, in 1762. The study of philosophy occupied most of his time, though not to the exclusion of religious and moral duties. He published several scientific and metaphysical works, the principal of which are his "Philosophical Conversations" 3 vols.; and his "Ancient Origin of the New Philosophy," 3 vols.

REGNAULT, MICHAEL LOUIS STEPHEN, a French advocate and statesman, was born at St. Jean d'Angeli, in 1760. Having distinguished himself at the bar, he was chosen a deputy of the states-general from the tiers-état of the country of Auais, and became the editor of a daily paper called the "Journal de Versailles." He was proscribed in 1792, and being discovered and arrested at Douai, he did not obtain his liberty till after the fall of Robespierre. During the consulate and imperial sway of Buonaparte he was honoured and promoted, and acquitted himself with great ability as attorney-general, &c. Although he foresaw the fall of Napoleon on the opening of the Russian campaign, he continued faithful to his interests, and followed Maria Louisa to Blois. After the battle of Waterloo he pleaded for the resignation of Buonaparte in favour of his son; and his proposition being rejected, he quitted France for America; where he remained four years. He at length, in 1819, obtained permission to return; but being in the last stage of sickness when he landed, he expired in a few hours after his arrival.

REGNIER, MATHURIN, a French poet, and the first who succeeded in France as a satirist, was born at Chartres, in 1573. He was brought up to the church, which he disgraced by his debaucheries; yet he obtained a canonry in the cathedral of his native place, with other benefices, and a pension. Died, 1613. His "Satires" still retain a place in the standard literature of his country.

REGNIER, CLAUDE AMBROSE, duke of Massa, minister of justice under the government of Napoleon, was born at Hismont, in La Meurthe, in 1736; practised as an advocate at Nancy; was a member of the constituent assembly; retired from public affairs during the reign of terror; but after the fall of Robespierre, became a member of the council of ancients, and took an active part in the senate. He assisted in the elevation of Buonaparte as first consul; and in 1802 he was appointed grand judge, minister of justice, &c. In 1813 he became president of the legislative body; and died in the following year.

REGULUS, MARCUS ATILIUS, a Roman general, celebrated for his patriotism and devotion in the service of his country, was made consul a second time about 256 B.C., and with his colleague, Manlius Vulso, commanded in the first war against Carthage. Made prisoner by his opponents, he was sent to Rome with an embassy, that peace might be procured on favourable terms, and bound himself, by an oath, to return if the terms were rejected. He, however, considered it his duty to advise the continuance of the war; which being determined on, no entreaties or supplications could prevent him from fulfilling his solemn engagement; and the Carthaginians, on his return, put him to an ignominious and cruel death.

REICHARD, HENRY AUGUSTUS OTTOCAR, a German writer, was born at Gotha, in 1751, and died in 1828. He is extensively known by his "Traveller's Guide in Europe," 2 vols. He also wrote poems, comedies, &c.; and held a considerable office in the government of Saxe-Gotha.

REICHARDT, JOHN FREDERIC, a musical composer and author, was born at Königsberg, in 1731; studied under Kant; was for a long time director of the Italian opera at Berlin; and subsequently had the direction of the French and German theatres at Cassel. Among his compositions, which are very numerous, are the "Famlane" of Morel, and the "Panthea" of Berquin. His literary productions are, "Familiar Letters written during a Journey in France in 1793, and again in 1803 and 1804," 5 vols.; "Familiar Letters on Vienna, &c.," and "Napoleon Buonaparte and the French People under his Consulate," &c. Died, 1814.

REICHENBACH, GEORGE OF, a distinguished mechanical artist, was born at Mannheim, in 1772, and died at Munich, in 1826. He and his coadjutor Fraunhofer, were unsurpassed in the manufacture of optical instruments generally, and quite unrivalled in the execution of telescopes, heliometers, theodolites, &c.

REID, THOMAS, a celebrated Scotch divine and metaphysician, was born in 1709, at Strachan, in Kincardineshire, and educated at the Marischal college, Aberdeen. In 1764 he succeeded Adam Smith as professor of moral philosophy at Glasgow; and died in 1796. His principal works are, "An Inquiry into the Human Mind;" and "Essays on the Intellectual and Active Powers of Man." Dr. Reid was the first writer in Scotland who attacked the scepticism of Hume, and endeavoured to refute the Ideal Theory which was then prevalent.

REIGNY, LOUIS ABEL BEFFROI, an eccentric and fertile French writer, commonly called Cousin Jacques, was born at Laon, in 1757, and died at Charenton, in 1810. He was the author of several successful plays and works of a burlesque character; and he commenced a periodical publication, entitled "Dictionnaire des Hommes et des Choses," which, on account of its offensive politics, was suppressed.

REIL, JOHN CHRISTIAN, professor of medicine, counsellor, &c., was born in East Friesland, in 1758. He taught and practised at Halle for twenty years, until the university was ruined by the French conquests. In 1810 he was appointed professor in the university of Berlin; and a short time before his death, in 1814, he was invested with one of the highest medical offices in the military department. His skill in mental maladies, and his investigations into the structure of the brain, &c. have acquired for him a lasting reputation.

REINECCIUS, REINER, a German writer, was a native of Steinhelm, and the disciple of Melancthon. He taught the belles lettres, first at Frankfurt, and next at Helmstadt, where he died in 1594.

REINHOLD, ERASMUS, a German mathematician and astronomer, was born at Salfeldt, in Thuringia, in 1511; became professor of mathematics at Wittenberg, and died there in 1553. His works are, "Theoria nova Planetarum;" "Ptolemy's Almagest, with a Latin version;" "Prutnice Tabule Cælestium Motuum;" and "Primus Liber Tabularum Directionum."

REISKE, JOHN JAMES, an eminent philologist and oriental scholar, was born at Zorbig, in Saxony, in 1716; studied at Halle and Leipzig; became Arabic professor at the latter place; was appointed rector of the college of St. Nicholas; and died in 1774. His works and translations of classic authors are numerous and erudite: among them are, valuable editions of the "Mœlem Annals of Abulfoeda;" the "Greek Anthology;" "Plutarch;" the "Greek Orators;" &c.—He was assisted in his researches by his wife, ERNESTINA CHRISTINA, who learned Greek and Latin for the express purpose; and after his death she completed some of his undertakings, and published his autobiography.

REIZ, or REITZ, FRÉDÉRIC WOLFGANG, a German philologist, born in 1733. He successively held the professorships of philosophy, Latin and Greek, and poetry, in the university of Leipzig; of the library of which he was also director. He edited the works of Herodotus and some other classic authors. Died, 1790.

RELAND, ADRIAN, a learned Orientalist, was born at Alkmaar, in 1676. He studied at Amsterdam, Utrecht, and Leyden; and was successively professor of philosophy at Harderwick, and of oriental languages and ecclesiastical history at Utrecht, where he died in 1718. Among his works are, "De Religione Mohammedica;" "Dissertationum Miscellanearum;" "Antiquitates Sacre Veterum Hebræorum;" "Dissertationes quinque de Nummis Veterum Hebræorum;" "Palestina ex monumentis veteribus illustrata et Chartis Geographicis," &c. 2 vols. 4to.

REMBRANDT VAN RHYN, PAUL, one of the most celebrated painters and engravers of the Dutch school, was born in 1606, near Leyden. His passionate love for art disappointed his father's desire of educating him as a scholar; but he received some instruction in the art of painting from Peter Lastmann of Amsterdam, but soon returned home, and pursued his labours there, taking nature as his sole guide. He came into notice by taking a picture to the Hague, where a dealer gave him one hundred florins for it; which circumstance procured him employment and pupils. Rembrandt was master of all that relates to colouring, distribution of light and shade, and the management of the pencil; and though he was deficient in some of the other requisites of a true artist, it cannot be denied, that his pencil is masterly and unique, possessing an energy and effect belonging to no other painter. His etchings possess a wonderful freedom, facility, and boldness, and are truly picturesque. Rembrandt married the handsome daughter of a peasant, who used to sit to him as a model. He resided during the greater part of his life at Amsterdam, and he soon acquired a large fortune. His habits, however, were low, and his avarice insatiable; so that he lived like a beggar, and descended to the meanest tricks to increase his hoard. He died in 1674, or, according to some accounts, in 1688.

REMIGIUS, St., or REMI, was archbishop of Rheims, and converted king Clovis to Christianity. He died in 1533.—There was another St. REMIGIUS, who was archbishop of Lyons, in the ninth century. He defended St. Augustine's doctrine of grace and predestination against Godescalc, and resided at the council of Valence in 855. Died, 876.

REMIGIUS, of Auxerre, a learned Benedictine of the ninth century, was brought up in the abbey of St. Germaine; but afterwards he taught at Rheims, and next at Paris, where he opened the first public school in that city. He wrote several Commentaries on different portions of Scripture.

REMUSAT, JEAN PIERRE ABEL, an eminent linguist, was born at Paris, in 1788. He was professor of the Chinese and Tartar languages at the College de France; was admitted into the Academy of Inscriptions in 1816; and after Visconti's death in 1818, he was appointed editor of the "Journal des Savans." His principal works are, "Essai sur la Langue et Littérature Chinoises;" "Plan d'un Dictionnaire Chinois;" "Mélanges Asiatiques;" and "Comptes Chinois," 3 vols. Died, 1832.

RENAU D'ELISAGARAY, BERNARD, an able French naval architect, was born in Bearn, in 1652. He was employed at Brest in the construction of large ships; and in 1660 he conceived the idea of bomb-vessels, which were used at the bombardment of Algiers, and the success of which led to his being appointed to conduct several sieges under Vauban. For these services he was made a captain in the navy, honoured with the cross of St. Louis, and rewarded with a pension of 12,000 livres. He wrote "Théorie de la Manœuvre des Vaisseaux;" and died in 1719.

RENAUDOT, THEOPHRASTUS, a physician, was born at Loudun, in 1583; and died at Paris, in 1653. He was the first projector of gazettes, or newspapers, in France, which he published under the title of "Mercure Française," from 1635 to 1643. He was the author of a "Life of Henry II. prince of Condé, and other biographical works.—His son, EUSENIUS, who died in 1720, was a learned oriental scholar. He became prior of Frossey, in Bretagne; was admitted a member of the academy Della Crusca, and of that of the Inscriptions; and was the author of several works illustrative of the literature and manners of the East.

RENEL, Major JOHN, was born at Chudleigh, in Devonshire, in 1742; first entered the naval service as a midshipman, and served in India, but quitted it for the East India company's military service, and became surveyor-general of Bengal. Returning to England in 1782, he was elected a member of the Royal Society; and from this period he held an extensive correspondence with men of learning both at home and abroad. He now published his celebrated "Memoir and Map of Hindostan;" and he assisted in the formation of the Asiatic Society. He was also the author of "Observations on the Topography of the Plain of Troy;" three memoirs on the "Geography of Africa;" the "Geographical System of Herodotus explained;" and the "Marches of the British army in the Peninsula of India." He died in 1830.

RENNELL, THOMAS, son of Dr. Rennell, the learned and venerable dean of Winchester, was born in that city, in 1787, and was placed at an early age at Eton, where he distinguished himself by his proficiency in classical literature, and obtained Dr. Buchanan's prize for the best Greek Sapphic ode "On the Propagation of the Gospel in India." In 1806 he removed to King's college, Cambridge, and two years after gained the Brunonian prize for the best Greek ode. On taking his first degree, he entered into orders, and became assistant preacher to his father at the Temple church; in 1811 he published "Animadversions on the Unitarian Version of the New Testament;" about which time he undertook the editorship of the British Critic. In 1818 he was presented to the vicarage of Kensington, and in the same year he was elected Christian advocate, in the University of Cambridge, in which capacity he published two excellent treatises; one, entitled "Remarks on Scepticism, especially as connected with the Subjects of Organization and Life;" the other, "Proofs of Inspiration on the Grounds of Distinction between the New Testament and the Apocryphal Volume." In 1823 Mr. Rennell was presented to the mastership of St. Nicholas's hospital, and a prebend in Salisbury cathedral; but a violent attack of fever, which terminated in a gradual decline, put an end to the hopes of his friends and admirers in the following year. He died at Winchester, June, 1824, just as he had completed his last work, a new translation of "Munster's Narrative of the Conversion of Count Struensee."

RENNIE, JOHN, a celebrated civil engineer and mechanist, was born at Phantassie, in East Lothian; settled in London in 1783; and first became known by his talent he displayed in the construction of the Abdon Mills. His next concern was in superintending the new machinery of Whitbread's brewery, the execution of which increased his fame. He soon, however, became eminent in labours of a superior kind, and stood at the head of the civil engineers of this country. Among his public works, may be mentioned Ramsgate Harbour; Waterloo, Southwark, and New London Bridges; the Breakwater at Plymouth; the Crinan, Lancaster, Kennet and Avon, and other canals; and several docks and harbours, among which are those of London, Hull, and Sheerness. But the Bell Rock Lighthouse, constructed on the same principle as that of the Eddystone, will, perhaps, be deemed the greatest effort of his genius. For steady resolution and inflexible perseverance Mr. Rennie was rarely surpassed; and it was these qualities, combined with eminent natural talents, that so admirably fitted him to contend with or guard against the great physical operations of nature—confining torrents within specific bounds, or subduing the violence of the most boisterous seas. Died, 1821.

RENTI, GASTON JEAN BAPTISTE, baron DE, a French nobleman of the 17th century, remarkable for his ascetic piety. After serving with distinction in the wars of Lorraine, and obtaining the approbation of his sovereign, he determined to retire from the world; and from the age of twenty-seven he devoted the remainder of his life to works of charity, religious exercises, and mortification. He died in 1649. An abridgment of his Life, by de St. Jure, a Jesuit, was published by the celebrated John Wesley.

REPNIN, NICHOLAS WAKLIEWITCH, prince, born in 1731, was a Russian field-marshal, and served under Peter I. He was afterwards appointed by Catharine II. assistant to the Russian ambassador at the elevation of Stanislaus to the throne of Poland, in 1764, and he subsequently became Russian minister at Waraw. He was soon after this employed on diplomatic missions at Constantinople and Breslau. In 1789 he succeeded count Romanzoff in the command of the army of the Ukraine, and in 1791 he defeated the grand vizir Yusuf; but having offended prince Potemkin, he was disgraced and banished to Moscow; whence, however, he was recalled to be made governor of Livonia. In 1796 Paul I. promoted prince Repnin to the rank of a field-marshal, and in 1798 sent him on a secret mission to Berlin; but being unsuccessful in his endeavours to prevail on the Prussians to join the confederacy against France, he was on his return ordered to retire to Moscow, where he died in 1801.

REPTON, HUMPHREY, a private gentleman, distinguished by his skill in ornamental gardening and architecture, was born at Bury St. Edmunds, in 1752. In 1783 he accompanied Mr. Windham to Ireland, and for a short time held a situation at Dublin, under government. On his return to England, he adopted the profession of landscape gardening, in which he soon obtained extensive celebrity. He published several works on miscellaneous subjects, but his principal productions are on the theory and practice of his art. Died, 1816.

REQUENDO, VINCENTE, a learned Spanish Jesuit, born at Grenada, in 1730. He had a great taste for the fine arts, and published an elaborate work on the "Roman Antiquities in Spain;" but he is best known by his "Saggi sul ristabilimento dell' antica arte de' Greci, e de' Romani Pittori," 3 vols., in which he proposed to restore the Grecian and Roman art of painting. Died, 1792.

RESENDE, LUCIUS ANDREW, considered as the restorer of literature in Portugal, was born at Evora, in 1498; studied at Alcala and Salamanca; became an ecclesiastic; contributed greatly to diffuse general instruction in his country; and died in 1573. He left many historical pieces, which are highly esteemed, and also poems.

RESTAUT, PIERRE, a French grammarian, was born at Beauvois, in 1606; became an advocate in the parliament of Paris; and died in 1764. His "French Grammar," and his "Treatise on French Orthography," were long considered as the best works of the kind in the language.

RESTOUT, JOHN, a French painter, was born at Rouen, in 1692; became director of the Academy of Painting; and died in 1768.—His son, who was also a good painter, and a member of the academy, died at Paris in 1797.

RETZ, JOHN FRANCIS PAUL DE GONDY, a French cardinal, and a celebrated political character, was born at Montmirail, in 1613; became coadjutor to his uncle, the archbishop of Paris; and after many intrigues, and fighting several duels, he was made archbishop of Corinth, and a cardinal. He conspired against the life of cardinal Richelieu, and took a prominent part in opposing Mazarin during the minority of Louis XIV. In short, he was the Catiline of the day. At length Mazarin, who both hated and feared him, imprisoned him in the castle of Vincennes, whence he was removed to Nantes, from which he escaped, and subsequently travelled through Holland, Flanders, and England. In 1675 he wished to give up his cardinal's hat, and retire from the world, but the pope would not receive it; and as the latter years of his life made some amends for his former crimes, he died regretted, at Paris, in 1679. He was daring, turbulent, and intriguing; and in his "Memoirs," which were written by himself during his retirement from the busy scenes of public life, he has drawn his own portrait with considerable skill and impartiality.

REUCHLIN, JOHN, a celebrated German philologist, born at Pfortzheim, in 1455. Having studied the law, and obtained the diploma of licentiate in that faculty at Poitiers, he was employed in several diplomatic missions; and while at Rome with Everard, count of Wurtemberg, he was received with the distinction due to his talents, and was particularly noticed by Lorenzo de' Medici, at Florence. After the renewal of the league of Suabia, in 1500, Reuchlin was appointed judge of a tribunal at Tubingen, which office he held eleven years. In his old age he was reduced to poverty, and was persecuted by the ecclesiastics for opposing Pfeffercorn's design of burning all the Jewish books except the Bible. Reuchlin was the preceptor of Melancthon; and died in 1522. He composed the first Hebrew grammar and lexicon for the use of Christians; and he was the author of several other works.

REUVENS, JOHN EVERARD, one of the most profound lawyers Holland ever produced, was born at Haarlem, in 1763; studied at Leyden; acquired great reputation at the Hague as an advocate; and was appointed, in 1793, councillor to the court of justice of the province of Holland. In 1801 he became president of the high court of justice; and under the regal government, in 1806, he was nominated councillor of state extraordinary, and subsequently vice-president of the council. On the union of Holland to France, in 1810, he became president of the court of appeal at the Hague; but was soon after invited to Paris, and made councillor of the court of cassation; which office he relinquished when, in 1814, the independence of his native country was secured, and returned to the presidency he had quitted at the Hague. He went to Brussels in 1816, on a legal mission, and there perished, the victim of a dark conspiracy, the authors of which have never been discovered. His judicial and political knowledge enabled him to fill his different offices with vigour and ability; and he earned a lasting reputation by the criminal code of the Netherlands, which may be said to be almost entirely his work.

REVELEY, WILLEY, an English architect and antiquary, was a pupil of Sir William Chambers. He accompanied Mr.

Stuart to Greece, and completed the great work on the "Antiquities of Athens" left by that eminent artist. Mr. Reveley built the church of All Saints, at Southampton, and various other structures. Died, 1799.

REVELLIERE-LEPAUX, LOUIS-MARIE, one of the members of the French directory, was born at Montaigne, in 1753, and brought up to the profession of the law. On the breaking out of the revolution, he displayed great ardour in supporting popular opinions; became a member of the Constituent Assembly; and, in 1792, of the National Convention. He procured the decree of the Convention, purporting "that the French nation would give assistance to all oppressed people who wished to recover their liberty;" and voted for the death of the king, and against the appeal to the people. He afterwards opposed Danton, and in vain defended the proscribed Girondists; was compelled to seek for safety in concealment, but returned to Paris after the death of Robespierre. On the creation of the Institute, he was nominated a member of the class of moral and political sciences; advocated some religious ceremonies which resembled the principles of the theophilanthropists; and was represented as the high-priest of that once prevalent sect. He refused to take the oath of allegiance to Napoleon, required from the members of the Institute, and retired to the neighbourhood of Orleans, where he lived in obscurity for a time; afterwards returned to Paris; and died in 1824. He left "Memoirs," with directions for their being published at a future time.

REWBELL, JEAN BAPTISTE, one of the directors of the French republic, was born at Colmar, in 1746. On being chosen a deputy from the tiers-etat to the states-general in 1789, he displayed a decided enmity to the existing government. He became attorney-general syndic of the department of the Upper Rhine; and on being nominated a deputy to the Convention in 1792, he voted for the establishment of a republic, and strenuously recommended the trial of Louis XVI. After filling several important situations, he was at length raised by his colleagues to the highest magistracy of the state. He held the office of director till 1799, when he was replaced by the abbé Sieyès; and he died in comparative obscurity, in 1801.

REY, JOHN, a French physician, of the 17th century, who may be regarded as one of the precursors of the science of pneumatic chemistry. He published an interesting work in 1630, by which it appears he had discovered that the increase of weight in calcined metals arises from the absorption and solidification of air; and on this the antiphlogistic theory of chemistry is, in a great measure, founded. He died in 1645.

REY, JEAN BAPTISTE, an eminent French musician, was born at Lauzerte, in 1734. While at Nantes, his reputation as a composer having reached the ears of the court, he was sent for, and appointed chamber-musician to the king, with a salary of 2000 francs; and though the revolution interfered with his promised advancement in the royal household, he continued to direct the opera orchestra for more than thirty-five years, and under Napoleon was appointed to superintend that of the chapel-royal. He composed a number of operas, &c.; and died in 1810.

REYHER, SAMUEL, professor of mathematics and jurisprudence in the university of Kiel, was born in 1635, and died in 1714. He was the author of an astronomical work, entitled "De Mundo;" "Mathesis Biblica," &c.

REYNEAU, CHARLES RENE, an eminent French mathematician, was born at Brissac, in 1656, and entered into the congregation of the Oratory. Having become well acquainted with geometry, and studied the Cartesian philosophy, he taught mathematics and physics at Toulon and Angers. He was the author of "Analyse Demontrée," 2 vols. 4to., and "Science du Calcul des Grandeurs." Died, 1728.

REYNER, EDWARD, a nonconformist divine, was born in Yorkshire, and educated at Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and, about 1627, settled at Lincoln; but in 1662 was ejected from his living, and died soon after. He wrote "Precepts for Christian Practice;" "Vindication of Human Learning and Universities," &c.

REYNIER, JOHN LOCIS ERNESTER, a French general, was born at Lausanne, in 1771. He entered into the army; and in the early campaigns of the French republic, he so far signalized himself, as to be appointed a general of brigade during the conquest of Holland, in 1794. He afterwards served under Moreau, as chief of the staff; and in the memorable retreat in 1796, as well as on other occasions, gave proofs of his superior military talents. In 1798 he accompanied Buonaparte to Egypt; was present at the battle of the Pyramids; commanded for a time at Acre; overthrew the Janizaries, and thus contributed greatly to the victory of Heliopolis; but having subsequently quarrelled with general Menou, he was coolly received by Buonaparte on his return to France. Having killed general D'Estaing in a duel, he was exiled from Paris; but in 1805 he was recalled, and served in Italy. Soon after, he entered into the service of Joseph Buonaparte, at that time king of Naples, and was defeated by the English, under general Stewart, at the battle of Maida. He commanded the Saxons at the battle of Wagram; was engaged, in 1812, in the Russian campaign; was made prisoner at the battle of Leipsic; and, on being exchanged, he went to Paris, where he died, in 1814.

REYNOLDS, EDWARD, an English prelate, was born at Southampton, in 1595. He was one of the assembly of divines, and became bishop of Norwich, where he died, in 1676.

REYNOLDS, SIR JOSHUA, an eminent English painter, equal in many points to the "old masters," and often excelling them in grace, in taste, and in the harmony of colouring, was the son of a clergyman at Plympton, in Devonshire, where he was born, in 1723. He early discovered a predilection for the art of drawing, which induced his father to place him, at the age of seventeen, with Hudson, the most famous portrait painter in London, with whom he remained three years, and then, upon some disagreement, returned home. He then proceeded to Rome, in which capital, and other parts of Italy, he spent three years. On his return to London, his talent placed him at the head of the English portrait painters; and being a man of literary abilities and an amiable companion, as well as a first-rate artist, he soon numbered among his intimate friends, several of the most distinguished characters of the day. Rejecting the stiff, unvaried, and unmeaning attitudes of former artists, he gave to his figures air and action adapted to their characters, and thus invested them with something of the dignity of history. When the Royal Academy was instituted, in 1768, he was unanimously chosen president, and was knighted; and although it was no prescribed part of his duty to read lectures, yet his zeal for the advancement of the fine arts induced him to deliver annual or biennial discourses before the academy on the principles and practice of painting. Of these he pronounced fifteen, from 1769 to 1790, which were published in two sets, and form a standard work. He was a member of the celebrated club which contained the names of Johnson, Garrick, Burke, and others of the first rank of literary eminence, and seems to have been universally beloved and respected by his associates. In 1773 the university of Oxford conferred on Sir Joshua the honorary degree of doctor of laws, and in 1783 he was appointed principal painter to the king. This great artist died, unmarried, at his house in Leicester-square, Feb. 23, 1792, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral. Speaking of his talents and his general character, Burke happily remarks, "He had too much merit not to excite some jealousy; too much innocence to provoke any enmity."

REYRAC, FRANCIS PHILIP LAURENS DE, a French ecclesiastic, was born at Longville, in the Limousin, in 1734. He became canon regular of Chancelade, prior of St. Macloù, at Orleans, and an associate of the Academy of Inscriptions. He is principally known by his "Hymns to the Sun," in the florid prose style of Fenelon. He also wrote "Idylls in prose;" "Sacred Poems," &c. Died, 1782.

REYS, ANTONIO DOS, a learned Portuguese divine, was born at Pernes, near Santarem, in 1680. He became historiographer to the congregation of the Oratory, chronologist of the kingdom, and a member of the Portuguese Academy of History. Among his works are, "Latin Poems;" "Life of Ferdinand de Menezes;" "Corpus illustrium Poetarum Lusitanorum," 7 vols. &c. Died, 1738.

REZZONICO, ANTHONY JOSEPH, count, an Italian nobleman, born at Como, in 1709. He became marshal of the camp, chamberlain to the duke of Parma, and governor of the citadel. He devoted much of his time to literary pursuits, and produced several works, among which are two volumes of poems possessing considerable merit. Died, 1795.

RHAZES, or ALBUCEAR MOHAMMED, an Arabian physician, was born in Khorasan about 652, and resided at Bagdad, where he was superintendent of the public hospital. He was the first who gave a distinct account of the small-pox, which disease made its first appearance in Egypt in the reign of the caliph Omar. Died, 932.

RHEINEK, CHRISTOPHER, a German musical composer, born at Memmingen, in 1748. He produced the opera of "Le Nouveau Pygmalion," "Le Fils Reconnaissant," and "Rinaldo;" besides the oratorio, "Der Todtgesang Jesu," and a collection of songs, in 4 vols. Died, 1796.

RHIGAS, or RIGAS, a modern Greek patriot, born at Velesitini, in Thessaly, about 1753. He was soon distinguished for his ready apprehension and extensive acquirements, being intimately acquainted with the ancient literature of Greece, as well as with the Latin, French, German, and Italian languages. Looking forward for an opportunity when his country might throw off the Turkish yoke, he conceived the project of a grand secret society, and among the discontented chiefs who became associated with him, was the pacha Passawan Oglou. He then proceeded to Vienna, which place he made the focus of an extensive correspondence with persons of intelligence possessing similar principles with himself in various parts of Europe. He also commenced a Greek journal for the instruction of his countrymen, composed a treatise on military tactics, drew up a grand chart of all Greece, in twelve divisions, and translated the travels of Anacharsis the Younger and other French works. But being treacherously denounced to the Austrian government by one of his associates, as a conspirator against the state, he was arrested at Trieste, and ordered to be delivered up to the Ottoman Porte. His conductors, however, fearing to be intercepted by Passawan Oglou, drowned him in the Danube, together with eight of his companions who had been arrested at the same time. May, 1798.

RHODE, JOHN GEORGE, an eminent Orientalist, of Breslau, in Silesia; particularly distinguished for his scientific researches into the natural history and antiquities of India and Bactria. Died, 1827.

RHODES, ALEXANDER DE, a French Jesuit missionary, who in 1616 went to the East Indies, and after residing for some time at Goa, proceeded to Tonquin and Cochinchina to preach Christianity; but being, through persecutions, compelled to relinquish his labours there, he returned to Europe, and afterwards engaged in a new mission to Persia, where he died in 1660. He wrote several works, relating chiefly to the progress of the Gospel in those parts of the East which he had visited.

RHODIUS, JOHN, a learned Danish physician and antiquary of the 16th century; author of many excellent medical works, considering the time in which he wrote.

RHUNKEN, or RUHNKEN, DAVID, an eminent critic, was born at Stolpen, in Pomerania, in 1723. He was intended for the clerical profession, but at Wittenberg he took the degree of LL.D., and devoted himself to the cultivation of classical literature. He afterwards went to Leyden, and became attached to Hemsterhuis, who recommended him as a classical tutor, and persuaded him to publish a lexicon to the Timæus of Plato. He next went to Paris, where he availed himself of the stores of learning contained in the royal library. In 1757 he became assistant to Hemsterhuis at Leyden, and on the death of Ouden-dorp, was appointed professor of Latin oratory and history. He long continued the great ornament of the university; and died, much regretted, in 1798.

RHYNE, WILLIAM FEN, a celebrated Dutch physician and naturalist, born at Deventer, about 1640. Being appointed physician to the Dutch East India company, in 1673, he remained some time at the Cape of Good Hope, to examine the productions of the country and the manners of the inhabitants; after which he went to Java with the same object, and employed himself with great assiduity in scientific researches. While there, it is said, he made a voyage to Japan, and cured the emperor of a dangerous malady. On his return he published the result of his observations.

RIBAS, JOSEPH DE, a general in the Russian army, was a native of Naples, and born about 1735. Being at Lexhorn at the time Alexis Orloff arrived there with his fleet for the purpose of carrying off the natural daughter of the empress Elizabeth, whom prince Radziwill had taken to Rome and then abandoned, he assisted in this undertaking, and then went to Russia to obtain from Catharine II. the reward of his services. After attending on the son of the empress by Gregory Orloff in his travels, he obtained a regiment of carabineers; and in 1790 he commanded, with the rank of admiral, the fleet destined for the attack of Kilis and Ismail, to the success of which he greatly contributed. Having again signalized himself in her service, both as an officer and a diplomatist, the empress, in 1792, made him a rear-admiral, and further rewarded him with a pension of 20,000 rubles.

RIBERA, ANASTASIOS PANTALEON DE, a Spanish poet, called the Scarron of Spain, was born at Madrid, and on account of his wit was entertained at the court of Philip IV.

RIBERA, JOSEPH, called Lo Spagnoletto, an eminent painter, was born at Xativa, in Valencia, about 1583. He was at first a pupil of Caravaggio, and on going to Rome, he studied the works of Raphael, the Caracci, &c. with great advantage. He then visited Parma and Modena, and thence went to Naples, where the viceroy named him his own painter. In 1648, when don John of Austria visited Naples, Ribera imprudently boasted to him of the beauty of his daughters, which led to an intrigue with one of them, and the prince carried her off. This so affected the father, that, according to some accounts he left his house suddenly, one day, in 1649, and was never again heard of. Others state that he died at Naples in 1656. His historical pictures are chiefly representations of martyrdoms, tortures, &c.; the genius of Spagnolotto, in fact, seemed to revel in scenes of horror and cruelty.

RIBES, ANN ARNAUD DE, a French officer of engineers, born in 1731, was a lieutenant-colonel at the commencement of the Revolution, and in 1793 contributed to the capture of Rosas and several other fortified towns, while attached to the army of the Eastern Pyrenees. He had afterwards the direction of the fortifications in the Isle of Elba; and in 1808 he added to his reputation by triumphing a second time at Rosas over the strength of the fortifications and the resistance of the besieged. Died, 1811.

RICARDO, DAVID, celebrated for his writings on finance and statistics, was born in London, of a Jewish family, in 1772. His character for probity, industry, and talent, early procured for him the means of support; and, becoming a member of the stock exchange, he accumulated immense property. In 1810 he appeared as a writer in the "Morning Chronicle," on the subject of the depreciation of the national currency; he advocated the principles of Malthus concerning population; and published a treatise on "Political Economy and Taxation," which affords a luminous exposition of the origin and fluctuation of national wealth and expenditure. In 1819 Mr. Ricardo was elected into parliament for the Irish borough of Portarlington; but he never spoke, except on subjects of finance and commerce, on which occasions he was always attended to with great deference. Died, 1823.

RICAUT, or RYCAUT, Sir PAUL, an English traveller and historical writer, was the son of a merchant in London; received his education at Trinity college, Cambridge; and in 1661 went to Constantinople, as secretary to the embassy, and there wrote his "State of the Ottoman Empire." He was next appointed consul at Smyrna, where, by the command of Charles II. he wrote "The present State of the Greek and Armenian Churches;" and on his return home he was made secretary to the lord-lieutenant of Ireland, a privy-councillor, and a judge of the high court of admiralty. William III. employed him as the English resident in the Hanse Towns, where he continued ten years. Besides the works before mentioned, he wrote a continuation of Knolles's "History of the Turks;" a Translation of Platina's "Lives of the Popes;" and Garcilasso de la Vega's "History of Peru." Died, 1700.

RICCATI, VINCENT DE, a Jesuit, was born in 1707, at Castel Franco; became an eminent mathematician, and was for thirty-five years professor of the higher branches of the mathematics at Bologna. Died, 1773.—His brother, count JORDANO DE RICCATI, who was noted as a mathematician, an architect, and a musician, died at Treviso, aged 61.

RICCI, MATTHEW, a Jesuit and missionary in China, who was in such high favour with the emperor of China, that he gave him permission to build a church there. Died, 1810.

RICCI, LORENZO, the last general of the Jesuits previous to their suppression by pope Clement XIII., was born at Florence, in 1703; entered into the order of St. Ignatius at the age of fifteen; became, successively, spiritual director at the Roman college, and secretary of his order; and succeeded, on the death of Centurioni, in 1758, to the office of general. On the suppression of the Jesuits he was confined as a prisoner in the castle of St. Angelo, and there died in 1775.

RICCI, SCRIPPO, an Italian prelate, was a nephew of the preceding, and born at Florence, in 1741. He was raised to the bishopric of Pistola and Prato, in 1768; and distinguished himself by strenuously seconding the grand duke Leopold in the attempt to introduce a reform into the ecclesiastical discipline of the duchy. By doing this, he incurred the displeasure of the pope, was obliged to resign his bishopric, and subsequently underwent much persecution; though he became reconciled to the holy see, in 1805, by signing a formula of adhesion to the bulls which he had objected to. Died, 1810.

RICCOBONI, LODOVICO, an eminent comedian and author, was born at Modena, in 1774; acquired an early reputation on the stage; and was popular both in his own country and at Paris. In 1799 the duke of Parma appointed him inspector of the theatres in his dominions; but in 1791 he returned to Paris, where he devoted his last years to literature; and died in 1763. He wrote several comedies and poems, besides a "History of the Italian Theatre," and other works on dramatic subjects.

RICCOBONI, ANTHONY FRANCIS, son of the preceding, was born at Mantua, in 1707, and was also an actor and a dramatic writer. His comedies were very successful; but what he gained by the stage he spent in foolish attempts to discover the philosopher's stone. Died, 1772.—His wife was a celebrated French novelist; but, from the neglect of her husband, she suffered much, and died in poverty, in 1792.

RICH, CLAUDIUS JAMES, a learned orientalist, was born, near Bristol, in 1796. At the age of seventeen he was made a writer to the East India Company; and he finally became their resident at Bagdad. His researches into the antiquities of the East were extensive, as may be seen by his "Memoirs of Ancient Babylon," and his valuable collection of oriental MSS., which was purchased by parliament for public use. Died, 1821.

RICHARD I., king of England, surnamed Cœur de Lion, was born in 1157, and ascended the throne on the death of his father, Henry II. in 1189. He had taken the cross previous to his accession, and now bent all his views to the gratification of his martial ardour in the fields of Palestine; for which object he raised money by the sale of the crown property and offices; and a great number of English barons joined in the enterprise. In 1190 Richard joined the crusade with Philip of France; and 100,000 of their bravest subjects met together on the plains of Vezelai. They at length reached their place of destination; but mutual jealousies among the Christian princes took place, and Philip returned to Europe, leaving behind him 10,000 of his men. Richard remained in the East, where he displayed the most heroic valour against Saladin, whom he signally defeated near Caesarea, and having made a truce, embarked in a vessel, which was shipwrecked on the coast of Italy. He then, in the disguise of a pilgrim, travelled through part of Germany; but being discovered by Leopold, duke of Austria, he was made prisoner, and sent to the emperor Henry VI., who kept him confined in a castle some time. He was at length ransomed by his subjects, on the payment of 150,000 marks, and landed at Sandwich in 1194; after which he was again crowned. Philip having, contrary to treaty, seized on part of Normandy, Richard invaded France with a large army, but a peace was concluded in 1196. The war was, however, renewed in 1199; and Richard, in besieging the castle of Châlons, was wounded by a shot from the cross-bow of one Bertrand de Gourdon, who being asked what induced him to attempt the king's life, replied, "You killed my father and my brother with your own hand, and designed to put me to an ignominious death." The prospect of his own death inspired Richard with sentiments of moderation and justice, and he ordered Gourdon to be set at liberty, and allowed a sum of money; but the savage Marcadée, who commanded the Bretons, caused him to be slayed alive. Richard died of his wound on the 6th of April, 1199, in the 42nd year of his age, and the tenth of his reign, leaving no issue. His character was strongly marked, presenting much to admire, and much to condemn. He was the bravest among the brave; frank, liberal, and often generous; at the same time, he was haughty, violent, unjust, and sanguinary; untinged, as Gibbon observes, "the ferocity of a gladiator to the cruelty of a tyrant." His talents were considerable, both in the cabinet and in the field; neither was he deficient in the art of poetry, as some of his compositions, preserved among those of the Troubadours, bear witness. In fine, there is a sort of romantic interest attached to his character and exploits calculated to interest our feelings, rather than to satisfy our reason.

RICHARD II., king of England, the son of Edward, prince of Wales, commonly called the Black Prince, was born in 1366, and succeeded Edward III., his grandfather, in 1377. At his minority he displayed remarkable promptitude in quelling the dangerous insurrection headed by Wat Tyler, in Smithfield. When that insurgent was slain by Walworth, mayor of London, the young king, then about fifteen years of age, rode up to the irritated populace, and said, "Follow your king, I will be your leader, and redress your grievances." The people, struck with astonishment, obeyed the call, and dispersed quietly to their own homes, with the exception of a few ring-leaders, who were executed. The remainder of his reign, however, was less fortunate. Discontents prevailed among the nobility, of which Henry, duke of Lancaster, availed himself, and assumed the title of king. Richard was betrayed into his hands by the earl of Northumberland in 1392, and confined in Pontefract castle, where he abdicated the throne in a written instrument, but was assassinated the same year.

RICHARD III., king of England, born in 1450, was the brother of Edward IV., and created duke of Gloucester. He is represented as having been of diminutive stature, deformed from his birth, and of a forbidding aspect; but far more depraved in his mind than forbidding in his person. He caused his nephews, Edward V. and Richard, duke of York, to be secretly murdered in the Tower; after which he procured himself to be proclaimed king, in 1483. The duke of Buckingham, who had assisted him in his usurpation, conspired against him, but was taken prisoner and beheaded. Henry, earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII. of the house of Lancaster, was abroad, but returned privately, and landed at Milford, in Wales, where he was joined by a few followers, who soon increased. He then marched against the tyrant, whom he encountered at Bosworthfield, where Richard, after performing prodigies of valour, was slain; and his crown being found, it was placed on the head of Henry, August 22, 1485. Thus fell, in his thirty-fifth year, this odious prince, who united deep policy and dissimulation with the basest treachery and the most insatiable ambition.

RICHARD, surnamed ARMACHANUS, a pious and sensible prelate, who, after having been commissary-general of the university of Oxford, and dean of Lichfield, was raised to the see of Armagh in 1347, and honourably distinguished himself by his opposition to the mendicant orders, whose affectation of poverty, superstitious practices, and irregularities, he exposed in his lectures. For this he was obliged to repair to Avignon, to defend himself before pope Innocent VI., who decided against him. Died, 1360.

RICHARD of CIRENCESTER, so named from his native place, was an historian of the 14th century. He became a Benedictine monk of the abbey of St. Peter, Westminster; devoted his leisure to the study of our natural history and antiquities; wrote "The Description of Britain," first published in Latin, at Copenhagen, in 1767; and died in 1401.

RICHARD, LOUIS CLAUDE MARIE, an eminent French botanist, was born at Versailles, in 1754; completed his education at the Mazarin college, Paris, where he assiduously applied himself to the study of botany, comparative anatomy, mineralogy, and zoology. On being appointed naturalist to the king in 1781, he sailed on a voyage of research to French Guiana and the Antilles, and returned in 1789 with an immense collection of newly-discovered plants, insects, birds, quadrupeds, minerals, geological specimens, &c. On the formation of the Institute, he was chosen a member of the first class in the section of zoology and comparative anatomy; was also a corresponding member of the Royal Society of London; and was made a member of the legion of honour. Besides writing many valuable memoirs in periodical works, he was the author of "Demonstrations Botaniques, on l'Analyse du Fruit considéré en général." Died, 1821.

RICHARDSON, SAMUEL, a celebrated novelist, was born in 1689, in Derbyshire, and received his education at a common day-school. At the usual age he was bound apprentice to a London printer, and after the expiration of his time he worked as a compositor and corrector of the press some years. At length he took up his freedom, and set up business for himself, first in a court in Fleet-street, and afterwards in Salisbury-square. He became one of the principal in his profession, and, by the interest of Mr. Onslow, speaker of the House of Commons, obtained the printing of the Journals. In 1754 he was chosen master of the stationers' company; and in 1760 he purchased a moiety of the patent of law-printer to the king. In 1740 he published "Pamela," the popularity of which was so great, that it ran through five editions in one year, being recommended even from the pulpit. In 1748 "Clarissa" fully established his literary reputation; and its pathos, its variety of character, and minute development of the human heart, will cause it ever to be regarded as a work of real genius. The "History of Sir Charles Grandison" appeared in 1753, and was received with great applause. Besides these works, all of which have a moral tendency, Mr. Richardson published a volume of "Familiar Letters, for the use of Young People;" and an edition of "Æsop's Fables, with Reflections." His "Correspondence" with persons of eminence was published in 1804, with his "Life" by Mrs. Barbauld. He was unaffectedly pious and unostentatiously benevolent, and lived surrounded by a circle of affectionate friends, who valued him for his moral worth and amiable disposition. Died, 1761.

RICHARDSON, JONATHAN, a printer and author, was born about 1685. He quitted the profession of a scrivener to become a pupil of Riley, the portrait painter, whose niece he married. After the death of Kneller and Dahl, he was considered at the head of his profession in this country. He was the author of an "Essay on the Art of Criticism in Painting;" "An Argument in behalf of the Science of a Connoisseur;" "Account of Statues, Bas-reliefs, Drawings, and Pictures, in Italy;" "Notes and Remarks on Paradise Lost;" &c. Died, 1743.—In the two last-mentioned performances he was assisted by his son, who died in 1771.

RICHARDSON, JOSEPH, a lawyer and poet, was born at Hexham, in Northumberland; was entered of St. John's college, Cambridge, in 1774; became a student of the Middle Temple in 1779; and was called to the bar in 1784. He wrote Criticisms on the "Rolliad," and "Probationary Odes for the Laureatship;" two satirical works on public characters, which were very popular at the time; and "The Fugitive," a successful comedy. Died, 1803.

RICHARDSON, WILLIAM, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was a son of the minister of Aberfoyle, and was educated at the university of Glasgow. He accompanied lord Cathcart, who had been his pupil, to Russia; and was for more than forty years professor of humanity at Glasgow. Among his works, all of which are marked by elegance and erudition, are, "Anecdotes of the Russian Empire;" "Essays on Shakspeare's Dramatic Characters;" "Observations on the Study of Shakspeare;" poems, and tales. Died, 1814.

RICHELET, CESAR PETER, a French writer, was born at Chemillon, in 1631, and died in 1698. He compiled a dictionary, full of information, but interspersed with much satire. It was first published in 1680, in one vol. 4to.; but was afterwards enlarged to 3 vols. folio.

RICHELIEU, ARMAND JOHN DU PLESSIS, a cardinal, and minister of state in France, was born at Paris, in 1585, and died in 1642. He was at first intended for the army; but the bishopric of Luçon being open to him by the resignation of his brother, he studied theology with such industry, that he obtained the mitre before he was twenty-two. He was also appointed grand almoner, and in 1616 made secretary of state. When Mary de' Medici fell into disgrace, Richelieu was banished to Avignon, where he wrote his "Method of Controversy." Being soon after recalled to court, he brought about a reconciliation between the king and queen, for which he was rewarded with a cardinal's hat, and appointed prime minister. Being a man of prodigious capacity, and of a restless and insatiable ambition, he formed to himself vast designs, which made his whole life a series of agitations and inquietudes; still he showed himself a patron of men of letters, and caused the arts and sciences to flourish in the kingdom. He abounded, however, rather with great qualities than good ones, and therefore was much more admired than beloved. He died, amidst storms and peril, before he had completed any of his designs; leaving behind him a name somewhat dazzling, but by no means dear and venerable. Cardinal Mazarin carried on Richelieu's plans, and completed many of his schemes.

RICHELIEU, LOUIS FRANCIS ARMAND DU PLESSIS, duke of, a French marshal, descended from the same family as the cardinal, was born in 1696, and died in 1788. After the death of Louis XIV. he was admitted into the court of the regent, duke of Orleans, and he largely participated in its profligacy. He was sent to the Bastille in 1716, for fighting a duel with the count de Gace, and again in 1719, as an accomplice with the Spanish ambassador, in a conspiracy against the regent. He distinguished himself under Villars, and afterwards at Kehl, Philippsburgh, Dettingen, and Foutenoy; conquered the island of Minorca; forced the duke of Cumberland to submit to the capitulation of Gloucester; and pillaged the electorate of Hanover in a most infamous manner. In 1781 he obtained the rank of dean of the French marshals; and he concluded his long career, varied as it was with acts of heroism and villany, at the age of 92, in 1788.

RICHELIEU, ARMAND EMANUEL DU PLASSIS, duke of, grandson of the preceding, was born at Paris, in 1776, and eventually became prime minister to Louis XVIII. He emigrated at the commencement of the Revolution; entered the Russian service; and distinguished himself at the siege of Ismail, for which he was rewarded with the rank of major-general. In 1801 he revisited France, when Buonaparte endeavoured to attach him to his service; but he returned to Russia, and in 1803 he was appointed governor of Odessa, which city, by his prudent measures, he raised from insignificance to the height of prosperity. On the restoration of the Bourbons he took his seat in the chamber of peers; accompanied Louis XVIII. to Ghent; and returning with him to Paris after the battle of Waterloo, was appointed president of the council of ministers, and placed at the head of the foreign department. He soon resigned his post; but again held the office of prime minister in 1820; and died in 1822.

RICHER, EDMUND, a learned French divine, was born at Chaurice, in the diocese of Langres, in 1560, and became grand master of the college of Le Moine. He opposed the papal authority, in a treatise "On the Civil and Ecclesiastical Power," which caused so great a commotion, that the author was deposed, and sent to prison. He also wrote "A History of General Councils," 4 vols. Died, 1631.

RICHER, JOHN, a French astronomer and mathematician, who in 1702 was sent by Louis XIV. to South America for the purpose of making observations, and was the first who observed the contraction of the pendulum in the equatorial regions, whence Newton derived evidence of the oblate spheroidal figure of the earth. Died, 1696.

RICHMOND, LEIGH, a clergyman of the established church, was born at Liverpool, in 1773; became chaplain to the Lock Hospital, London, and afterwards rector of Turvey, in Bedfordshire. He is principally known as the author of "Annals of the Poor," containing the Dairyman's Daughter, and other devotional tales, written with great force, originality and pathos. He also wrote a work, entitled "The Fathers of the English Church," &c. Died, 1827.

RICHTER, OTTO VON, a Russian traveller, who accompanied Lindmann, a learned Swede, to Egypt and Nubia, where they discovered several remains of ancient architecture. They returned to Cairo, in 1815, and proceeded by water to Jaffa; at Acre the two friends separated, and Richter went alone by the way of Tyre and Sidon, to Balbec, after which he traversed Syria as far as the mountains of Lebanon, and went to Tadmor, in the desert; but, on his return to Smyrna, in 1817, he died.

RICHTER, JOHN PAUL FREDERIC, a celebrated German novelist, was born in Franconia, in 1763; studied at Leipzig; settled at Weimar; was patronized by the king of Bavaria; and died in 1825. His works are very numerous; and though they are generally in the form of romances, many of them treat of abstruse questions in philosophy, and are marked by much singularity of style.

RIDER, WILLIAM, an English divine, several years under-master of St. Paul's school, and lecturer of St. Vedast, Fosterlane. He published a "History of England;" a "Commentary on the Bible;" and other compilations. Died, 1785.

RIDLEY, NICHOLAS, an eminent English prelate, and protestant martyr, was born in 1500, at Tyndale, in Northumberland, and educated at Cambridge. He travelled on the continent, and, during a three years' absence from his native country, became acquainted with several of the early reformers, whose doctrines he afterwards warmly espoused. Returning to Cambridge, he filled the office of proctor to the university, and as such protested against the claims of the papal see to the supreme ecclesiastical jurisdiction in the realm. He was also chosen public orator; became one of the king's chaplains; and was finally elevated to the see of London, where he discharged the duties of his office with unwearied diligence. He was likewise employed in all the most important ecclesiastical measures of that reign, particularly in the compiling of the liturgy, and the framing of the articles of religion. But one of the most distinguished acts of his life, was that of inciting king Edward to endow the three great foundations of Christ's, Bartholomew's, and St. Thomas's hospitals. Having inadvertently concurred in the proclamation of lady Jane Grey, he was, on the death of Edward, marked out as one of the most prominent victims of papal authority; and being condemned, as a heretic, to the stake, he suffered, with the venerable Latimer, at Oxford, Oct. 15, 1555.

RIDLEY, SIR THOMAS, a learned civilian, of the same family as the preceding, but born at Ely, was educated at Eton, and at King's college, Cambridge; he afterwards became a master in chancery, and vicar-general to the archbishop of Canterbury; and died in 1628. He wrote "A View of Civil and Ecclesiastical Law."

RIDLEY, GLOSTER, an English divine, and a dramatic and theological writer; born, 1702; died, 1774.—His eldest son, JAMES, was author of "The Tales of the Genii," and some other literary performances.

RIEDELSE, FREDERICA CHARLOTTE LOUISA, barones, wife of colonel Riedesel, who commanded the troops at Brunswick employed in the English service in America in 1777, accompanied her husband, and wrote an interesting account of her adventures, entitled "Voyage de Mission en Amérique," &c. She returned to Europe in 1783; and, having lost her husband, fixed her residence at Berlin, where she died in 1808.

RIEDINGER, JOHN ELIAS, a celebrated painter of animals, born at Ulm, in Suabia, in 1695; died, 1767.

RIEGO, RAFAEL DEL, a Spanish patriot officer, was born in the Asturias, in 1785. The enthusiasm with which he embraced the cause of independence rendered him a zealous patriot, and a long imprisonment in France afforded him leisure to continplate the miseries of his countrymen. Before he returned to Spain, he visited Germany and England. Till 1820 every effort for liberty had been followed by exile, and the horrors of the Inquisition; nearly all the chiefs who favoured liberty were in confinement, but the valour of Riego was at once triumphant; he delivered Quiroga from the hands of his gaolers, and on the 1st of January, his troops proclaimed the constitution. General O'Donnell made his victory difficult, but he was victorious; and in the first sitting of the Cortes, in 1822, they appointed him their president. At the height of his glorious career his moderation was most conspicuous; he avoided parade, and displayed real magnanimity, prudence, and disinterestedness. Fortune, however, changed. Ferdinand VII. was reinstated; and the popularity of the brave Riego exciting the jealousy of those in power, he was calumniated as a promoter of anarchy. Still he preserved the confidence of the people, and again appeared in arms to assert the liberty of his country, but it was destined to fall before foreign foes. He was taken prisoner after the surrender of Cadiz, and conveyed to Madrid on the 2d of October. His wife and brother came to England, where they hoped to obtain friends for Riego; but their supplications were vain, and he was condemned to an ignominious death, viz. that his limbs should be sent to different parts of the Peninsula, and his head kept at Las Cabezas, where the constitution was first declared. He suffered, Nov. 7, 1823; and his wretched wife died of grief a few months after.

RIEM, JOHN, a German agriculturist, who devoted his attention principally to the management of bees, in which he was very successful. He was appointed secretary to the economical society at Dresden, in which city he died in 1807.

RIENZI, NICHOLAS GABRIINI DE, a native of Rome, who in the 14th century obtained great celebrity by his attempts to restore the republic. He was of low origin, but had received a liberal education, and possessed great eloquence and lofty views, which induced his fellow-citizens to send him as one of their deputies to pope Clement VI., then at Avignon. Rienzi, on this occasion, drew so affecting a picture of the distressed state of the city, that the pope appointed him apostolic notary, which office he discharged with great credit. But while he appeared actuated by the purest principles, he was secretly forming a conspiracy for the alteration of the government, and he let no opportunity pass of exciting the discontent of the people, by haranguing against the nobility and the defects of the public administration. By these means he became the idol of the people, who conferred upon him the title of tribune, with the power of life and death, and all the other attributes of sovereignty. What was more extraordinary, the pope confirmed the title, and Rienzi for some time governed the city with judgment and moderation. But the intoxication of supreme power betrayed him into extravagances; and he was expelled, and imprisoned for three years by Clement VI. He was released by Innocent II., who sent him again to the Roman capital as governor. But Rienzi's cruelties raised him new enemies, and he was massacred in 1354, about seven years after the commencement of his extraordinary career.

RIGAUD, HYACINTHE, an eminent portrait painter, was born at Perpignan, in 1663; and died at Paris, in 1743. He met with distinguished patronage, and has been called the Vandyck of France.

RILEY, JOHN, an eminent painter, born in London, in 1646. After the death of Sir Peter Lely he was appointed painter to the king, and rose greatly in public estimation; but, according to the opinion of lord Orford, he was so distrustful of his own merit, that his modesty and humility were great impediments to his advancement. He died in 1691.

RING, JOHN, an eminent surgeon, was born near Salisbury, in 1751; was a pupil of the two Hunters, at St. George's hospital; and practised in the metropolis, with deserved reputation, till his death, which occurred in 1821. He was a zealous defender of vaccination, to support which, he established an institution at a considerable expense, and he also liberally gave his assistance to other charities. Besides his medical works, he occasionally composed Latin and English verse, with fluency, spirit, and elegance; among which should be noticed his "Translation of the Works of Virgil, partly original, and partly altered from Dryden and Pitt," a vols.

RINGGLI, GOTHARD, a celebrated Swiss artist, was born at Zurich, in 1775, and died in 1835.

RINUCCINI, OTTAVIO, a Florentine poet, who went to France with Mary de' Medici, and is said to have been the first who invented the opera, or musical drama, in the year 1600. He wrote three pieces, "Daphne," "Eurydice," and "Ariadne." Died, 1621.

RIOJA, FRANCISCO DE, an eminent Spanish poet, was born in 1600, and became librarian and historiographer to Philip IV. Besides his poems, he produced several excellent comic dramas, and other pieces adapted for scenic representation. Died, 1658.

RIOLAN, JOHN, an eminent physician, born at Amiens; became dean of the faculty at Paris; and died in 1606. He was a defender of the doctrines of Hippocrates, and the ancients, against the chemists.—His son, of the same name, born in 1577, became royal professor of anatomy and botany, and physician to Mary de' Medici; and to him the university of Paris is indebted for its botanic garden. He made discoveries in anatomy; published several works; and died in 1657.

RIPLEY, GEORGE, an English alchemist and poet, who died in 1490. He wrote a work entitled "A Compound of Alchymic," &c., and "Aurum Potabile, or the Universal Medicine."

RIPPERDA, JOHN WILLIAM, baron DE, a celebrated adventurer, was born, of a noble family in Groningen, in 1600; served some time as colonel of infantry in the Dutch army; and, in 1715, was sent on a mission to Spain, where he acquired such an ascendancy over Philip V. that the monarch took him into his service, made him prime minister, and created him a duke. At length he fell into disgrace, and was imprisoned in the castle of Segovia, whence he escaped in 1728, and came to England. In 1731 he went to Morocco, where he was favourably received by Muley Abdalla, and declaring himself a convert to the Mahometan religion, and taking the name of Osman, he obtained the chief command of the Moorish army at the siege of Ceuta. But the Moors being defeated, he fell from his second elevation; and, retiring to Tetuan, he there died in 1737.

RIPPON, THOMAS, chief cashier at the Bank of England. For upwards of fifty years he had devoted his time to the duties of his office in that establishment; and such was the force of habit, that he often declared he was never so happy as when there in his business. It is, indeed, asserted as a positive fact, that he never solicited but one holiday, which being granted, he left London with the intention of being absent a fortnight; but the ennui of an idle life, and the want of his usual occupation, so preyed upon his spirits, that he returned to the Bank at the expiration of three days, confessing that green fields and country scenery had no charms for him. Died, 1833.

RIQUET, PETER PAUL DE, a celebrated French civil engineer, born at Beziers, in 1681. He projected the noble canal of Languedoc, which opens a communication between the Mediterranean and the Bay of Biscay. It was commenced in 1666, and carried on during the remainder of his life. After his death, which occurred in 1680, his two sons completed it.

RISDON, TRISTRAM, an English topographer; author of a "Description or Survey of the county of Devon." Born, 1580; died, 1640.

RITCHIE, JOSEPH, an English traveller, who, in 1819, in conjunction with captain Lyon, engaged in the mission to explore the interior of Africa. They set out from Tripoli, and reached Mouzouk, the capital of Fezzan, where for some months they resided in circumstances of distress, arising from the want of funds, heightened by the treacherous conduct of Mukin, the bey of that country. Mr. Ritchie fell a sacrifice to the hardships and vexation he experienced; but captain Lyon returned to England, and published his well-known "Narrative" in 1821.

RITSON, ISAAC, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was born near Penrith, in Cumberland, in 1761; received a medical education at Edinburgh; came to London, where he became an author by profession; and died in 1780.

RITSON JOSEPH, an English lawyer and antiquary, was born at Stockton, in Durham, in 1752; settled in London as a conveyancer, and purchased the office of high-bailiff of the Savoy; and died in 1803. As an antiquary, particularly in our early national poetry, he exhibited much industry and intelligence; but his morbid singularities of temper, and his avowed contempt for religion, more than counterbalanced whatever merit he might have otherwise possessed. It would, however, be uncharitable not to attribute his imperfections to a species of long protracted mental derangement, of which distressing malady he died in 1803. His principal publications are, "A Collection of English Songs," 3 vols.; "The English Anthology," 3 vols.; "Metrical Romances," 3 vols.; "Biographia Poetica," &c.

RITTENHOUSE, DAVID, a celebrated American mathematician, was born in Pennsylvania, in 1732. In 1769 the American Philosophical Society employed him to observe the transit of Venus; and he afterwards constructed an observatory, where he made some important discoveries. After the revolutionary war, he was appointed director of the mint, and treasurer of his native province. He also had the degree of LL.D. conferred on him, and he succeeded Franklin as president of the Philosophical Society. Died, 1798. Dr. Rittenhouse is regarded by his countrymen as the Newton of America. That he possessed great talents and industry is indisputable; and it is more than probable that his exertions in the cause of science contributed in no small degree to the diffusion of a taste for mathematical and physical knowledge in the United States; but their encomiums of him are truly hyperbolic.

RITTER, JOHN WILLIAM, a celebrated German philosopher, was born at Samitz, in Silesia, in 1776. The study of electricity occupied his chief attention; and in 1798 he started the idea that the phenomena of animal life are connected with galvanic action; but, though highly scientific, he advocated the reveries of animal magnetism, &c. He wrote "Physico-Medical Memoirs," 3 vols., and other works. Died, 1810.

RITTERSHUYS, CONRAD, an eminent civilian and philologist, born at Brunawick, in 1560. He became professor of law at Altorf; wrote some works on civil law; and notes upon Greek and Latin authors. Died, 1618. — NICHOLAS RITTERSHUYS, his son, became professor of feudal law at Altorf, where he died in 1670. He published a collection, entitled "Genealogia Imperatorum, Regum, Ducum, Comitum," &c., 4 vols. folio.

RIVAROL, ANTHONY, count de, an able French writer, was born at Bagnols, in Languedoc, in 1757, and settled at Paris, where he formed an acquaintance with the most eminent literary characters of the age; but, on the breaking out of the Revolution, he went to Germany, and obtained the patronage of prince Henry of Prussia. He was much admired for his powers of wit and satire; and died at Berlin, in 1801. His chief works are, "Discours sur l'universalité de la Langue Française;" "L'Enfer," translated from Dante; "Lectures sur la Religion et la Morale;" "Petit Almanach des grands Hommes;" and "Lettres à la Noblesse Française."

RIVAULT, DAVID, a French mathematician, born at Laval, about 1571, who became tutor in mathematics and military tactics to Louis XIII., and was made a counsellor of state. Died, 1616.

HE THAT MORTIFIETH HIS NATURAL FASHIONS, IS SELDOM OVERCOME WITH WORLDLY IMPRESSIONS.

RIVAZ, PETER JOSEPH DE, a skilful French mechanist and chronologer, born in 1711. He made a watch which had the singular property of winding up spontaneously: invented an improved pendulum, &c. He also drained the mines of Pont-péau, in Brittany, and made many mechanical discoveries. Died, 1772.

RIVE, JOHN JOSEPH, a French bibliographer, was born in 1730, at Apt, in Provence. He was brought up to the church; but, on the breaking out of the Revolution, he became a furious anarchist, and ended a turbulent life at Marseilles, in 1792. He wrote numerous works, the most important of which is, "La Chasse aux Bibliographes et Antiquaires mal avisés," 2 vols.

RIVIERE, or RIVIERUS, LAZARUS, an eminent physician, was born at Montpellier, in 1589. He became professor of medicine at his native place in 1622, which situation he occupied till his death, in 1635. He published "Institutiones Medicinæ;" "Praxis Medicæ;" and "Observationes Medicæ et Curationes Insolites."

RIVIERE, MERCIER DE LA, a celebrated French political economist, who obtained the post of counsellor of the parliament of Paris in 1747; was afterwards made intendant of Martinique; and on his return published his noted work, entitled "L'Ordre naturel et essentiel des Sociétés politiques." The singularity of his schemes, and his high pretensions, were ridiculed by Voltaire, Grimm, and others; but, had some of his precautionary advice been attended to, it is possible that the Revolution, which he lived to witness, would not have taken place. Besides the before-mentioned work, he wrote "De l'Instruction publique, ou Considérations morales et politiques sur la Nécessité, la Nature, et la Source de cette Instruction." Died, 1794.

RIVIERE, the Duke DE, governor of the young duke of Bordeaux, was a devoted servant of the Bourbons. He emigrated with the French princes in 1789; served in the army of Condé, and became aid-de-camp to the ex-king of France, Charles X. Seven times he entered France in disguise, to correspond with the friends of his royal master; but in 1804 he was arrested, tried, and sentenced to death; from which he escaped through the intercession of Josephine, his punishment being mitigated into an imprisonment for four years.

RIVINUS, AUGUSTUS QUIRINUS, an eminent botanist and physician, whose real name was Bachmann, was born at Leipzig, in 1653; practised medicine, and was professor of physiology and botany in his native city; and died in 1733. He was the author of "Introductio generalis in Rem Herbariorum," and "Systema Plantarum;" in which he divides all plants into eighteen classes, distinguished by the number and form of their petals.

RIZZIO, RIZZI, or RICCI, DAVID, the son of a music and dancing-master at Turin, was born there in the earlier part of the sixteenth century. His musical abilities procured him notice at the court of Savoy, while his talents as a linguist caused him to be selected by the ambassador from the grand duke to Mary, queen of Scots, as a part of his suite. In 1564 he first made his appearance at Holyrood-house, where he soon became so great a favourite with the queen, that he was appointed her secretary for foreign languages. The distinction with which he was treated by his royal mistress, excited the envy of the nobles, and the jealousy of Darulcy. A conspiracy, with the king at its head, was accordingly formed for his destruction; and before he had enjoyed two years of court favour, the lord Methven, and others of his party, were introduced by Darnley himself into the queen's apartment, where they assassinated the unfortunate object of their revenge, who fell at the feet of his royal mistress, having received no less than fifty-six stabs in her presence. A.D. 1566.

ROBERT, HUBERT, an eminent French painter, was born at Paris, in 1732, and may be considered the first artist of the French school who studied with effect the decline and ruin of the monuments of ancient architecture. He resided in Italy several years; and during that time he painted the gardens and cascades at Rome in a most masterly manner. On his return to France he obtained admission into the academy; but his merit could not screen him from persecution in the Revolution, and he was thrown into prison, where he amused himself by designing, even though he expected every hour to be dragged to the scaffold. At length he obtained his release, and continued in the exercise of his profession till his death, in 1808.

ROBERT, PETER FRANCIS JOSEPH, a French revolutionary statesman, born near Givet, in 1743. Becoming secretary to Danton, he was elected a deputy to the convention, in which he voted for the death of the king. Having married Mademoiselle Keralio, he adopted the literary profession, and wrote several political works.—His wife, LOUISE FELICITE DE KERALIO, was born at Paris, in 1758, and died at Brussels, in 1821. Among her various works were, "Histoire d'Elizabeth, reine d'Angleterre," 5 vols.; "Amélie et Caroline," 3 vols., &c.; besides several translations from English and Italian authors.

ROBERT, FRANCIS, a modern geographer, born at Chalons, in France. In 1780 he obtained the title of royal geographer; in 1789 he joined the most active partisans of the Revolution; was nominated mayor of the commune of Besançon, in 1793; and in 1797 was chosen a member of the council of five hundred. The latter part of his life was spent in travelling; and he died at Heiligenstadt, in Saxony, in 1819. Besides some useful elementary works on geography, &c. he published his "Travels in Switzerland," and a "Description of France."

ROBERT DE VAUGONDY, GILES, a French geographer, born at Paris in 1688, and died there in 1766. Among his works are, "Grand Atlas Universel," and "Atlas complet des Révolutions du Globe."—His son, who assisted in his professional labours, held the office of royal censor, and was geographer in ordinary to Stanislaus I. king of Poland. He was the author of "Tab-

ROBERTI, JOHN BAPTIST, count, an Italian writer, was born in 1719. He was successively professor of philosophy in the college of Brescia, director of that at Parma, and, lastly, superior of the one at Bologna. He acquired great reputation by his writings, which relate to polite literature generally, and form 15 vols. Died, 1786.

ROBERTSON, WILLIAM, an Irish divine, was born at Dublin, in 1705; studied at Glasgow, but was expelled the university for the part he took in asserting the right of the students to choose a rector. On taking orders he obtained some preferment in Ireland, which he vacated by turning Arian. In 1768 he was chosen master of the grammar-school at Wolverhampton; and in 1773 he appeared as one of the committee of clergymen, employed to form and present the famous petition to parliament, to be relieved from the obligation of subscribing to the thirty-nine articles. Died, 1783.

ROBERTSON, WILLIAM, D.D., a celebrated historian, was born in 1721, at Borthwick, where his father was minister. Having completed his theological studies at Edinburgh, he obtained a license to preach, and in 1743 was presented to the living of Gladsmair, in East Lothian. He soon became distinguished by his eloquence and good taste as a preacher; but it was not till 1759, that, by his "History of Scotland," he acquired a place among British classical writers. The distinction and patronage acquired by this work, which reached a fourteenth edition before his death, appeared in his successive preferments. He became chaplain of Stirling Castle in 1759, king's chaplain in 1761, principal of the university of Edinburgh in 1762, and historiographer royal of Scotland in 1764. At the head of a flourishing seat of education, he was minutely attentive to all its duties; and co-operated with the greatest liberality in all the improvements which have raised Edinburgh to its present celebrity. Yet, notwithstanding his numerous pursuits and official avocations, he found time to employ himself in his celebrated "History of Charles V.," which, in 1777, was followed by the "History of America;" and his last publication was "An Historical Disquisition concerning the Knowledge which the Ancients had of India." He died in 1793. As an historian, Dr. Robertson is admired for luminous and skilful arrangement, graphic description, and a singularly perspicuous style.

ROBERVAL, GILES PERSONNE, an eminent French mathematician, was born in 1602, at Roberval, in the diocese of Beauvais; became professor of mathematics in the royal college at Paris; and was likewise a member of the academy of sciences. He wrote several mechanical treatises; and died in 1675.

ROBESPIERRE, FRANCIS MAXIMILIAN JOSEPH ISIDORE, one of the most violent and perfidious of the French revolutionists, was the son of a counsellor at Arras, and was born in 1759. After completing his studies at the college of Louis le Grand, at Paris, which he is said to have done in a manner highly creditable to his talents and assiduity, he adopted the law as a profession, and distinguished himself as an advocate of the council of Artois. At the convocation of the states-general, in 1789, Robespierre went to Paris as deputy, and appeared, for the first time, in the constituent assembly, on the 20th of July. In the sitting of the 24th of August, he moved for the liberty of the press: indeed, during this and the two following years, he appeared, on all subjects, the friend of the human race. His voice was raised against martial law, against the frequent punishment of death, and against slavery, as the most degrading of all punishments that man had the power to inflict: nay, so invincible appeared to be his justice and integrity, and so constantly and consistently did he declaim against political corruption, that he obtained the title of "The Incorruptible." To this period he was esteemed the friend of the French, and the Jacobin club raised him to power; but the Girondists were opposed to the Jacobins, and a scene of blood followed, to which hardly a parallel can be found in history. He laboured to form a republic; his rivals proposed a division in the government, so that it should exist in federative states, as of Bourdeaux, Lyons, Marseilles, &c.; and the latter accused Robespierre of aspiring to the dictatorship. However, in 1792, the Jacobins carried the decree in favour of an united and undivided republic. Another faction now arose, called "The Mountain," who also opposed the Jacobins. Violent contentions prevailed at every sitting, and Robespierre spent many hours in self-vindication, without being able to silence his enemies. Though it does not appear that Robespierre actively interfered in the massacres which took place in the prisons of Paris, in the beginning of September, he had sufficient address to reap the fruits, and, like other tyrants, he at length made his instruments his victims. After the trial and execution of the king, in promoting which the Girondists co-operated with Robespierre and the Jacobins, the former were speedily sacrificed to the ascendancy of the latter. The Herbertists, who had joined in this work of destruction, were the next victims to the jealousy of the dictator, who had no sooner sent them to the scaffold, with the assistance of Danton and his friends, than he adopted measures for the ruin of that popular demagogue, whom he dreaded as his most dangerous rival. In August, Robespierre presided in the national assembly; and from that period he played the part of a consummate hypocrite. The surrender of Toulon, by the party who had set out as supporters of the Girondists, completed his triumph; and under his influence the Convention established an organized government, in which terror was the order of the day. So powerful were his talents, and so judiciously did he manage them, that he pretended to guard against the prevalence of atheism and immorality, at the time that he was undermining the principles of religion itself. Barriere, by his direction, promulgated his new system of worship; and on the 8th of June, 1794, Robespierre, in person, celebrated what he impiously termed "The Feast of the Supreme Being." But, powerful and secure as he appeared, his cruel tyranny and mysterious denunciations had alarmed many of those who had been most intimately connected with him, and a conspiracy was formed for his destruction. Instead of acting with his accustomed decision, he now secluded himself from the public for more than a month; and when he again made his appearance in the National Convention, Tallien and others openly accused him of despotism; and amidst cries of "à bas le tyran," he, with his brother, and his friends St. Just, Couthon, and Le Bas, were arrested and sent to the Luxembourg prison. In the night, however, he was set free by the keeper, and was conducted to the hall of the commune of Paris, where Henriot, commander of the National Guard, and others, were waiting to receive him. Robespierre's friends proposed his placing himself at the head of the people, and to fall upon the members of the Convention, whom it was then easy to have delivered up as prisoners. To the proposal, he replied, "I should then conduct myself like a tyrant, were I to expose the lives of the citizens in my single cause: I shall submit to the will of the sovereign people, who are at liberty to protect or to abandon me: if the latter, I know how to die like Tiberius." Meanwhile his enemies proceeded to action. Barras and other commissioners, directing the military of Paris, seized the fallen tyrant and his associates; and he entered his solitary room with apparent indifference. Le Bas, having provided a pair of pistols, killed himself with one of them; and Robespierre, taking the other, put the muzzle to his mouth, and drew the trigger, intending to blow out his brains; but the ball fractured his lower jaw, and he was thus subjected to protracted suffering, which excited neither sympathy nor compassion. On the next day, July 28, 1794, he and his associates were guillotined. The career of Robespierre exhibits one of the most signal instances of terrorism upon record. But, though he was the most notorious of all the wretches that disgraced the name of man in France during the revolutionary furor, and entailed on his name the greatest degree of infamy, it is certain that some of his former accomplices, who contributed most to his overthrow, and were loudest in their accusations against him, had been the authors of many of the enormities with which he was charged. This was the opinion of Napoleon, who asserted that he had seen proofs of his having intended to re-establish order after he had overturned the contending factions: but not being powerful enough to arrest the progress of the Revolution, he suffered himself to be carried away by the torrent, as was the case with all before Napoleon himself, who engaged in a similar attempt.

ROBIN, JEAN, a celebrated French botanist, to whose care the Jardin des Plantes, at Paris, was first confided. Born, 1550; died, 1597.

ROBINS, BENJAMIN, an English mathematician of great genius and eminence, was born at Bath, in 1707; was a teacher of mathematics; became engineer-general to the East India Company; wrote "New Principles of Gunnery;" and was the real narrator of lord Anson's "Voyage round the World," though it was published under the name of Walter. Died, 1751.

ROBINSON, THOMAS, an English naturalist, was an episcopal clergyman, and held the rectory at Ousley, in Cumberland, where he died in 1719. His long residence in the neighbourhood of a mountainous and mineral district led him to turn his attention to the study of mineralogy, geology, &c. He wrote an interesting "Essay towards a Natural History of Westmoreland and Cumberland," &c.

ROBINSON, TANCRED, an eminent English physician and naturalist, who died in 1748.

ROBINSON, ANASTATIA, a public singer of some eminence, in the early part of the last century. She was placed under the tuition of the celebrated Dr. Croft and Signora Cuzzoni Sandoni; and though she never ranked as a first-rate vocalist, she sang at the Opera for some years, more admired perhaps for her personal charms, accomplishments, and irreproachable conduct, than for her acknowledged talents. At length she quitted the stage, in consequence of her marriage with the earl of Peterborough, though the connexion was not publicly acknowledged till some years after it took place. Died, 1750.

ROBINSON, ROBERT, an English divine, was born at Swaffham, in Norfolk, in 1725; published a translation of "Saurin's Sermons," an "Essay on the Composition of a Sermon," a "History of Baptism," &c. He was, successively, a Calvinistic methodist preacher, a Baptist minister, and a Socinian. Died, 1790.

ROBINSON, RICHARD, archbishop of Armagh and baron Rokeby, was born in Yorkshire, in 1709, and died in 1794. The archbishop, besides building a palace at Armagh, with an observatory, founded a school and a public library there, which last he furnished with a large collection of books, and left a liberal endowment for its support. He also erected four new churches in his diocese.

ROBINSON, MARY, a poetess and miscellaneous writer, whose maiden name was Darby, was born in 1738, at Bristol. At the age of fifteen she was married to an attorney of the name of Robinson, which precipitate step appears to have embittered the rest of her life. Being reduced in circumstances she had recourse to the stage, and made her first appearance at Drury-lane in the character of Juliet, in which she was instructed by Mr. Garrick. Her reception was very flattering, and she continued to perform in various characters till her representation of Perdita in the "Winter's Tale," when her beauty attracted the admiration of the prince of Wales (afterwards George IV.) in consequence of which she quitted the stage, and became his mistress. This connexion, however, was but of short duration. In 1784 she had the misfortune to be attacked by a violent rheumatism, which progressively deprived her of the use of her limbs, and she was partly dependent on her pen for the means of living. She wrote a number of poetical pieces under the name of Laura Maria; besides which she was the author of "Vandenza," a romance; "Poems," 2 vols.; "Walsingham," a novel, 4 vols.; her "Memoirs," 4 vols., &c. Died, 1800.

ROBISON, JOHN, an eminent mathematician, professor of natural philosophy at Edinburgh, was born at Boghall, in Stirlingshire, in 1739; was educated at Glasgow; became director of the marine cadet academy at Cronstadt, in Russia; and on his return to his native country, was appointed professor of chemistry at Glasgow, from whence he removed to Edinburgh, where he died in 1805. Dr. Robison published, in 1797, a book, entitled "Proofs of a Conspiracy." This work excited considerable notice and controversy. He was also the author of "Elements of Mechanical Philosophy," and some articles in the Encyclopædia Britannica.

ROB ROY, which signifies Robert the Red, was a celebrated Highland freebooter, whose true name was Robert Macgregor, but who assumed that of Campbell, on account of the outlawry of the clan Macgregor by the Scotch parliament, in 1662. He was born about 1660, and was the younger son of Donald Macgregor of Glengyle, said to have been a lieutenant-colonel in the service of James II., by his wife, a daughter of Campbell of Glenfalloch. Like other Highland gentlemen, Rob Roy was a trader in cattle previous to the rebellion of 1715, in which he joined the adherents of the Pretender. On the suppression of the rebellion, the duke of Montrose, with whom Roy had previously had a quarrel, took the opportunity to deprive him of his estates; and the latter began to indemnify himself by a war of reprisals upon the property of the duke. An English garrison was stationed at Invernsnaid, near Aberfoyle, the residence of Rob Roy; but his activity and courage saved him from the hands of his enemies, from whom he continued for some time to levy black-mail. The time of his death is uncertain, but he is known to have survived the year 1733, and died at a very advanced age.

ROBORTELLO, FRANCESCO, an Italian writer, was born at Udina, in 1516, and died at Padua, where he was professor of rhetoric and philosophy, in 1567. He wrote "De Vita et Victu populi Romani sub Imperatoribus," and other treatises, besides editing the works of many of the classic poets.

ROBSON, GEORGE FENNEL, an eminent draughtsman and landscape painter in water-colours, was born at Durham; and as he showed a decided taste for the art while a mere child, he was placed under the tuition of Mr. Harle, a drawing-master in that city. His progress was extremely rapid; and before he attained the age of twenty he visited London, where his talents soon became known. His first publication was a view of his native city, the profits of which enabled him to undertake a journey to the Scottish highlands, with whose wild and romantic scenery he had long wished for an opportunity to make himself acquainted. In the dress of a shepherd, with a wallet at his back, and Scott's poem, "The Lay of the Last Minstrel," in his pocket, he wandered over the mountains, winter and summer, till he had become familiar with the various aspects they presented under different changes of seasons, and was enabled to lay up a rich store of materials for the improvement of his taste and skill. On his return to London, where he took up his future residence, he published "Outlines of the Grampian Mountains," which, as well as his future productions, obtained him patronage and fame. One of his last and best pictures was a "View of London Bridge before Sunrise." He died in 1833. Among the engravings and published works of Robson, may be mentioned, "Picturesque Views of English Cities," with descriptive letter-press by J. Britton, F.S.A.; and "Landscape Illustrations of the Waverley Novels," engraved by the Findens.

ROCCA, ANGELUS, a learned ecclesiastic, born at Rocca Contrata, in the marche of Ancona, in 1545. He studied at Rome, Venice, and Padua; and in 1579 obtained a place in the Vatican, where also he had the superintendence of the Apostolic press. His works display great learning, and chiefly relate to morals and history. At his death, which happened in 1620, he left his valuable library to the Augustinian monastery at Rome, on condition that it should be accessible to the public.

ROCHAMBEAU, JEAN BAPTISTE DONATIEU DE VIMEUR, count de, marshal of France, was born at Vendome, in 1725; and entered the army at the age of sixteen. In 1746 he became aid-de-camp to Louis Philippe, duke of Orleans; and afterwards obtaining the command of the regiment of La Marche, distinguished himself at the battle of Lafeldt, where he was wounded; obtained fresh laurels at Crevelt, Minden, Corbach, and Clostercamp; and, having been made lieutenant-general, was, in 1780, sent with an army of 6,000 men to the assistance of the United States of America. Having embarked on Rhode Island, he acted in concert with Washington, first against Clinton, in New York, and then against Cornwallis. Rochambeau was raised to the rank of marshal by Louis XVI., and, after the revolution, he was appointed to the command of the army of the north; but he was superseded by more active officers, and, being calumniated by the popular journalists, he addressed to the legislative assembly a vindication of his conduct. A decree of approbation was consequently passed in May, 1792, and he retired to his estate, near Vendome, with a determination to interfere no more with public affairs. He was subsequently arrested, and narrowly escaped suffering death under the tyranny of Robespierre. In 1803 he was presented to Buonaparte, who granted him a pension, and the cross of grand officer of the legion of honour. His death took place in 1707; and his "Memoires" were published in 1709.

ROCHFORD, WILLIAM DE, a French writer, was born in 1731, at Lyons, and died at Paris, in 1788. His principal work is entitled "Refutation du Système de la Nature;" but he also wrote some tragedies, and translated the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer, the plays of Sophocles, &c.

ROCHEFOUCAULT, or ROCHEFOUCAULD, FRANCIS, duke de LA, prince of Marsillac, a distinguished courtier and man of letters in the reign of Louis XIV. was born in 1613, and died in 1680. He acted a conspicuous part in the civil war of the Fronde; but he is chiefly remembered as the writer of "Reflexions et Maximes," a work which has been extolled and criticised in no ordinary degree. He also wrote "Memoires de la Règne d'Anne d'Autriche;" and during the latter part of his life his house was the resort of the first-rate wits and literati of France.

ROCHEFOUCAULD-LIANCOUT, FRANÇOIS ALEXANDER FREDERIC, duke de LA, born in 1747, was grand master of the wardrobe to Louis XV. and XVI. He became a member of the constituent assembly in 1789; after the dissolution of which he took the military command at Rouen, in his capacity of lieutenant-general, during 1793. On the downfall of the monarchy he left France, and resided for eighteen months in England: he then travelled through the United States, whence he returned in 1798, and was allowed to revisit his native land, where he devoted himself to the promotion of the useful arts and to acts of benevolence. It was through his influence that vaccination was introduced into France. After the restoration he was created a peer, but, on account of the liberality of his sentiments, he was, in 1823 and 1824, excluded from the council of state, and removed from the several boards of which he was a member. His principal work is "Travels in the United States." Died, 1827.

ROCHEJAQUELEIN, HENRI DE LA, one of the most distinguished of the Vendean royalists, was born at Chatillon, in Poitou, in 1772, and was a son of the marquis de la Rochejaquelein. The peasants of the neighbourhood having risen in the royal cause, in 1792, he placed himself at their head, and addressed them in the following pithy harangue: "I am young and inexperienced, but I have an ardent desire to render myself worthy of heading you. Let us march to meet the enemy; if I give way, kill me; if I advance, follow me; if I fall, avenge me." He was subsequently chosen commander-in-chief of the Vendéans, and displayed great talent and the most daring valour. After gaining sixteen victories in ten months, he fell, at the age of twenty-two years, March 4, 1794, in a single combat with one of the republican soldiers, while defending the village of Noulle.

ROCHESTER, JOHN WILMOT, earl of, a witty and profligate nobleman of the court of Charles II., was born in 1648, and, on the death of his father, succeeded to his titles and estates, the latter of which, by extravagance, he soon dissipated. He became the personal friend and favourite of his sovereign, who is said to have encouraged and shared many of his exploits. The levity of his disposition frequently brought him into disgrace, and he was more than once forbidden the royal presence: his companionable qualities, however, which made him necessary to the amusement of his master, prevented his occasional exile from being ever of long continuance. His constitution at length gave way under such excesses; and at the age of thirty he was visited with all the debility of old age. He lingered for some time in this condition, and died, professing great penitence for his mis-spent life, in 1680. His satirical poems are keen, but their obscenity and implety render them alike dangerous and disgusting.

ROCKINGHAM, CHARLES WATSON WENTWORTH, marquis of, a British statesman, born in 1730, succeeded his father in his titles and estates in 1750, and in 1765 became first lord of the treasury. American affairs formed at that time a leading subject of discussion; and Rockingham took the middle way, by repealing the stamp act, and declaring the right of Great Britain to tax the colonies. He was therefore deserted by some of his supporters, and retired from the ministry in 1766. He afterwards acted in concert with Chatham, in opposition to the ministry of lord North; on the fall of which, in 1782, he was again placed at the head of the administration, but died in the same year, and was succeeded by lord Shelburne.

RODNEY, GEORGE BRYDGES, lord, a gallant English admiral, was the son of captain Henry Rodney, a naval officer, who, at the time of his son's birth, was commanding the yacht in which the king, attended by the duke of Chandos, used to pass to and from Hanover: hence he was christened George Brydges, the names of his royal and noble god-fathers. He entered the navy early in life, and obtained the command of a ship in 1742. In 1749 he was appointed governor of Newfoundland; and on his return, in 1753, married the sister of the earl of Northampton. In 1759 he was made admiral of the blue; and in the same year he destroyed the stores prepared at Havre de Grace, for an invasion of England. In 1761 he served on the West India station with such activity, that at the conclusion of the war he was made a baronet. In 1768 he was elected into parliament for Northampton; but the contest ruined his estate, and he found it necessary to retire to the continent. The French government made some overtures to him, which would have recruited his fortune. These he rejected; and, the fact having transpired, he was placed in command of a squadron destined for the Mediterranean. In 1780 he fell in with Langara's fleet, off Cape St. Vincent, and completely defeated it; and on the 13th of April, 1783, obtained a decisive victory over the French fleet, under De Grasse, capturing five and sinking one of his largest vessels. A barony and a pension of 2000*l.* were bestowed upon him for his services; and on his decease, in 1792, a monument was voted to his memory, at the national expense, in St. Paul's cathedral.

RODOLPH I., emperor of Germany, and founder of the imperial house of Austria, was born in 1218, being the eldest son of Albert IV., count of Hapsburg, and landgrave of Alsace. He first served under Ottocar, king of Bohemia, against the Prussians, and distinguished himself by his prudence, valour, and the spirit of justice with which he protected the inhabitants of the towns from their baronial oppressors. In 1273, as he was encamped before the walls of Basle, he received the unexpected intelligence that he was elected king of the Romans, and emperor, in preference to Alphonso, king of Castile, and Ottocar, king of Bohemia, the latter of whom opposed his election, but was defeated and slain. After a reign of nineteen years, he expired, in 1291, aged 72. He was brave, indefatigable, affable, magnanimous, intelligent, and just.

ROE, Sir THOMAS, an able statesman and ambassador, was born about 1580, at Low Layton, in Essex, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. In 1604 he was knighted, and soon after went to make discoveries in America. In 1614 he was sent on an embassy to the Great Mogul, at whose court he remained three years. In 1621 he went in the same capacity to the Grand Seigneur; in which post he continued under Osman, Mustapha I., and Amurath IV. During his residence there, he collected a number of manuscripts, which he presented to the Bodleian library, and also brought over the Alexandrian MS. of the Greek Bible, as a present to Charles I., from Cyril, patriarch of Constantinople. In 1629, Sir Thomas negotiated a peace between Poland and Sweden; and it was by his advice, that Gustavus Adolphus entered Germany, where he gained the battle of Leipsic. After the victory, the king sent him a present of 2000*l*. In 1640 he was chosen to represent the university of Oxford in parliament. The next year he was sent ambassador to the diet of Ratisbon, and on his return was made chancellor of the garter and a privy-councillor. Died, 1644.

ROEBUCK, JOHN, a physician and natural philosopher, was born at Sheffield, in 1718; was educated at Edinburgh and Leyden; and engaged in practice at Birmingham. He devoted his attention particularly to chemical experiments; and, in conjunction with Mr. Garbett, he established a sulphuric acid manufactory at Preston Pans, in Scotland, which proved very successful. In 1759 they also founded the celebrated Carron iron works. An unfortunate speculation, however, in attempting to work mines of coal and salt, on the estate of the duke of Hamilton, ruined his fortune; and he died, in embarrassed circumstances, in 1794.

ROEMER, OLAUS, a Danish astronomer, was born at Arhusen, in Jutland, in 1644. He studied at the university of Copenhagen, where he applied so diligently to the mathematics, that he was appointed tutor to the dauphin of France. In 1681 he returned to his native place, and held several considerable offices previous to his decease, which took place in 1710. He made many scientific discoveries, the most important of which was that of the velocity of light, from the observation of the eclipses of Jupiter's satellites. Died, 1710.

ROGERS, JOHN, an eminent English divine of the 16th century, was educated at Cambridge, and became chaplain to the factory at Antwerp, where he assisted Tindal and Coverdale in translating the Bible into English. In the reign of Edward VI. he returned to England, and obtained a prebend in St. Paul's cathedral. He was the first person executed in the succeeding reign on the score of his religion, being burnt at Smithfield in 1555.

ROGERS, Woods, an English circumnavigator, who belonged to the royal navy in 1708, when he was invited by the merchants at Bristol to take the command of an expedition to the South Sea. He set sail with two vessels, taking out Dampier as a pilot. Passing to the south of Terra del Fuego, in January, 1709, they entered the Pacific Ocean, and in February arrived at the isle of Juan Fernandez, where they found Alexander Selkirk: they then visited the coast of California, crossed the Pacific, and returned to England in October, 1711. Captain Rogers was afterwards employed with a squadron to extirpate the pirates who infested the West Indies. Died, 1732.

ROGERS, JOHN, a celebrated divine, was born at Ensham, in Oxfordshire, in 1679, and educated at Corpus Christi college, of which he became fellow. He wrote an able treatise on the "Visible and Invisible Church of Christ," against Hoadly; four volumes of Sermons; and an Answer to Collin's Scheme of Prophecy. Dr. Rogers obtained the living of St. Giles's, Cripplegate, and died in 1729.

ROGERS, the Rev. GEORGE, who, for upwards of half a century, was the rector of Sproughton, near Ipswich, was born in 1741; and died, at the patriarchal age of 94, in 1835. He was the author of several treatises on theological subjects; a strenuous advocate for civil and religious liberty; and an impressive preacher.

ROHAN, HENRY, duke of, a very distinguished peer of France, born in 1579. After the death of Henry IV. in 1610, he became the chief of the Huguenots; and having ably maintained three wars against Louis XIII., procured a peace upon advantageous terms, 1629. He distinguished himself also as a political writer, but at length died of wounds received at the battle of Rhinfield, in 1638. Among his works are, "Memoirs on French Affairs;" "The Perfect Captain;" and "Memoirs relative to the War of the Valteline," 3 vols.—His widow, MARGARET DE BETHUNE, daughter of the great Sully, was a courageous woman, and defended Castres against the marechal de Themines. Died, 1660.—ANNE ROHAN, sister of the duke, was distinguished by her spirit, learning, and piety. At the taking of Rochelle, she and her mother refused to be included in the capitulation, and were made prisoners of war. Died, 1646.

ROHAULT, JAMES, a French mathematician and natural philosopher, was born at Amiens, in 1629. He was a zealous Cartesian, and wrote a popular treatise on that ROLAND, PHILIP LAURENCE, an eminent French sculptor, was born near Lisle, in 1746, and, after studying at Rome, acquired great reputation in Paris. Died, 1816.

ROLAND DE LA PLATIERE, JEAN MARIE, a French statesman, was born at Lyons, in 1732, and held the office of inspector-general of manufactures after the commencement of the Revolution. He espoused the popular cause, and becoming closely connected with the Girondist party, he was made minister of the interior in 1792. The downfall of his party, in 1793, exposed him to proscription, but he found a secret asylum at Rouen. On hearing, however, of the condemnation and death of his wife, he deliberately stabbed himself, Nov. 15, 1793.

ROLAND, MANON JEAN PHILIPON, wife of the preceding, born at Paris, in 1754, was remarkable for her beauty, and received an excellent education. After her marriage, in 1779, Madame Roland took part in the studies and tasks of her husband, and the revolution found in her a ready convert to its principles. On the appointment of her husband to the ministry, she participated in his official duties, writing and preparing many papers, and taking a share in the political councils of the Girondist leaders. She was arrested on the fall of the party, and, when condemned to death, conducted herself with great firmness, exclaiming, at the time of her execution, "Oh Liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name!" Her death took place Nov. 8, 1793. She wrote "An Appeal to Impartial Posterity," and "Miscellaneous Works," 3 vols.

ROLANDINO, an old Italian historian, was born at Padua, in 1200, and died in 1276.

ROLLE, HENRY, an eminent lawyer and judge, was born at Heanton, in Devonshire, in 1589, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford; after which he became a student of the Inner Temple, and was called to the bar. In 1640 he was made a serjeant-at-law; and in 1648 he accepted the office of chief justice of the court of King's Bench. He wrote "Reports," 2 vols. folio; and "An Abridgment of Cases and Resolutions of the Law," which was published by Sir Matthew Hale.

ROLLE, DENNIS, a native of Devonshire, who traced his descent from Rollo, first duke of Normandy. In 1766 he purchased a whole district in Florida, whither he proceeded with a thousand persons to people his new possessions; but through the unhealthiness of the climate, and the desertion of those who escaped disease, he soon found himself without colonists and without money; so that, in order to revisit England, he was compelled to work his passage back in an American vessel. He was then satisfied to live on his paternal estate; had a seat in the House of Commons, and filled the office of sheriff for the county. He devoted much of his time to the improvement of the condition of the lower classes. Died, 1797.

ROLLI, PAUL ANTONIO, an Italian poet, born at Todi, in 1667. He came to England, and was employed in teaching some of the children of George II.; and died at Rome, in 1767. He published a collection of poems; also editions of several Italian authors; was the editor of Marchetti's "Lucretius;" and the translator of Milton's "Paradise Lost" into Italian verse.

ROLLIN, CHARLES, an eminent historian, born at Paris, in 1681. He was intended for business, but his talents obtained the notice of a learned Benedictine, by which he was enabled to gratify his inclination for learning. After going through a course of theology at the Sorbonne, he received the tonsure, and was twice chosen rector of the university of Paris. When elected a third time, he was deprived of his situation by the intrigues of the Jesuits; but he employed his leisure in composing his excellent work "On the Manner of Studying and Teaching the Belles Lettres," 4 vols. This was followed by his "Ancient History;" and nine volumes of the "Roman History." Died, 1741.

ROLLO, the conqueror of Normandy, was a Norwegian duke, banished from his country on account of his piracies by Harold Harfager, who conquered Norway in 970. He first retired with his fleet among the islands of the Hebrides, whither the flower of the Norwegian nobility had fled for refuge when Harold had become master of the kingdom. He was there received with open arms, by those warriors, who, eager for conquest and revenge, waited only for a chief to lead them on. Taking advantage of their sentiments at such a crisis, he pretended to have had a supernatural dream, which promised him a glorious fortune in France. This served at least to support the ardour of his followers; but the weakness of the French government, and the confusion in which it was involved, were still more persuasive reasons. Having therefore sailed up the Seine to Rouen, he immediately took the capital of that province, then called Neustria, the sovereignty of which Charles the Simple was obliged to give up to Rollo and his Normans, to purchase a peace. Soon after, Rollo was persuaded to embrace Christianity, and was baptized by the archbishop of Rouen, in the cathedral.

ROMAINE, WILLIAM, a popular Calvinistic divine, was born in 1714, at Harlepool, in Durham; and was educated at Hertford and Christchurch colleges, Oxford. In 1748 he obtained the lectureship of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate; the year following he was chosen lecturer of St. Dunstan in the West; and in 1750 he was appointed assistant morning preacher at St. George's, Hanover-square. Soon after this he was elected Gresham professor of astronomy, which situation he soon resigned. He obtained such popularity by his opposition to the bill for the naturalization of the Jews, that his publications on that subject were printed by the corporation of London. In 1764 he was elected to the living of St. Anne, Blackfriars, where, as well as at St. Dunstan's, he continued to officiate till his death, in 1793. Among his works are, "Discourses on the Law and Gospel;" "The Life of Faith;" "The Walk of Faith;" and the "Triumph of Faith."

ROMANA, DON PETER CARO Y SUREDA, marquis DE LA, a Spanish general, was born at Majorca, in 1761. He distinguished himself in the campaigns against the French, on the Pyrenean frontier, from 1793 to 1795; and commanded the auxiliary Spanish corps of 14,000 men, which was sent to the north of Germany by Napoleon; but when Spain rose against her oppressor, La Romana, aided by an English squadron, succeeded in embarking his troops from the island of Fuencaball, and leading them home in safety. During 1809 and 1810, he displayed great talents both as a general and a statesman; and his death, in 1811, was a real loss to his country.

ROMANZOFF, PETER ALEXANDROVITCH, count, a Russian general and field-marshal, was born about 1730, and having entered into the army when very young, his courage and abilities soon procured him promotion. He succeeded prince A. Galitzin, as commander-in-chief against the Turks, in 1770, and obtained many advantages over the enemy in that and the following years, previously to the treaty which he compelled the grand vizier to sign, in his camp at Kainardgi, in 1774. He soon after set out for his government of the Ukraine. He was again placed at the head of an army against the Turks, in the war which began in 1787; but being thwarted by Potemkin, he retired in disgust. Died, 1796.

ROMANZOFF, MICHAEL PAUL, count, son of the preceding, entered early on his diplomatic career, by accompanying his sovereign, in 1806, to the conference at Erfurt. He also executed other missions to the satisfaction of Alexander, who, after his rupture with France, appointed him minister at St. Petersburg. Having obtained leave to retire after the emperor's return, Romanzoff begged permission to devote the pension which had been settled upon him, as also the valuable presents made him during his diplomacy, for the use of the Russians who had been wounded in the previous campaign. He also employed his wealth in erecting churches, schools, and other patriotic establishments; and was at the expense of constructing and fitting out the ship in which young Kotzebue made his voyage of discovery. The sculptor Canova, a short time before his death, sent him as a present, a colossal statue representing the Goddess of Peace holding the olive branch, and leaning against a pillar, on which is engraved, "Peace of Abo, in 1743: Peace of Rudschuck Kainradji, in 1774: Peace of Fredricksham, in 1809:" these treaties having been severally signed by himself, his father, and his grandfather.

ROME DE L'ISLE, JOHN BAPTIST LOUIS, a French mineralogist, was born at Gral, in 1736; went to the East Indies as secretary to a company of artillery and engineering, and was made prisoner at Pondicherry; next visited China; and returned to France in 1764. He afterwards studied natural history, and gave lectures on mineralogy; wrote works on crystallography, metrology, &c., and died in 1790.

ROMILLY, SIR SAMUEL, a celebrated English advocate, and M.P. for Westminster, (descended from a Protestant family, who left France after the edict of Nantes), was born in London, in 1737, and placed in the office of a solicitor, which he quitted to study for the bar. Called in 1783, for some years his practice was chiefly confined to draughts in equity; but he gradually rose to distinction in the court of chancery, and ultimately took the lead, being equally distinguished by profound information, and forcible eloquence. His general politics agreeing with those of the Whigs, he was, during the short administration of Mr. Fox in 1806, appointed to the office of solicitor-general, and knighted. He was particularly distinguished by the eloquence with which he pleaded the necessity of a revision of the criminal code; on which subject he also composed a very able pamphlet, entitled "Observations on the Criminal Law of England." His knowledge of the law, his great talents, and his known integrity, rendered him the highest authority of his time. This good and useful man was, by the death of his beloved wife, afflicted with a brain fever, and, during a paroxysm, he put an end to his valuable life, Nov. 1818.

ROMNEY, GEORGE, an excellent painter, was born at Dalton, in Lancashire, in 1734. Having served his time to an artist named Steele, whom he soon surpassed, he came to London with a picture of the "Death of General Wolfe," which obtained the second prize in the exhibition, and sold for a considerable sum. After visiting Italy he returned to London, where he obtained great reputation. Died, 1802.

ROMULUS, the founder of Rome, and brother of Remus, was the son of Rhea Sylvia, daughter of Numitor, king of Alba. He died B.C. 713.

RONARD, PETER DE, a French elegiac and epigrammatic poet, of a noble family. Born, 1524; died, 1566.

ROOKE, LAURENCE, an eminent geometer and astronomer, born at Deptford, in Kent, in 1763; became astronomical professor of Gresham college; and was one of the original members of the Royal Society. Died, 1662.

ROOKE, SIR GEORGE, a gallant British admiral, was a native of Kent, and born in 1650. He destroyed the French and Spanish fleets in Vigo bay, in 1702, and captured several men of war and galleons; he also bore a part in the reduction of Gibraltar, in 1704. Admiral Rooke was not less distinguished for disinterestedness, than for skill and intrepidity. He died in 1709, declaring, in allusion to the contracted fortune he left behind him, that, "though small, it was honestly acquired, and had never cost a sailor a tear, or the nation a farthing."

ROSA, SALVATOR, a celebrated painter, poet, and musician, was born at Naples, in 1615. After studying under Francanzani, he became a disciple of Ribera, with whom he went to Rome. But his taste was formed more from the study of nature among the wilds of the Apennines, than from the lessons of other artists; and he delighted in delineating scenes of gloomy grandeur and magnificence. He also wrote plays, and performed parts in them; besides which he composed many cantatas. He was liberally patronized by the grand duke of Florence while residing in that city; the Maffei family also proved great friends to him, and it was at their seat, that he wrote his celebrated satires. On his return to Rome, he executed many pictures for churches; but his principal merit lay in the representation of the wild scenery of nature, storms, &c. Died, 1673.

ROSAMOND, usually called Fair Rosamond, was the daughter of Walter de Clifford, baron of Hereford, and the favourite mistress of Henry II. She had two sons by Henry; William, called Longsword, and Jeffery, who became archbishop of York.

ROSCIUS, QUINTUS, a Roman actor, born at Lanuvium, was so celebrated for his powers of representation, that his name has ever since been the characteristic distinction of performers of pre-eminent merit. Died, A.C. 61.

ROSCOE, WILLIAM, an eminent biographer and miscellaneous writer, whose life affords a memorable instance of what may be effected by the persevering efforts of unassisted genius, in acquiring a taste for the arts and sciences, with an extensive knowledge of ancient and modern literature. His parents, who were in an humble sphere, gave him the mere rudiments of a common education; and even of this young Roscoe neglected to avail himself. But he early began to think for himself; and his habits of mental application soon gave evidence of that genius which afterwards shone forth with so much splendour. Placed very early in a lawyer's office, he found leisure, without neglecting any of the duties of a clerk, to make himself master of the Latin language, so as to translate the classics, and also to study other ancient languages; and he then went through the same course with the modern languages, reading the best authors in each. At the age of sixteen, he published "Mount Pleasant," a poem that was well received. On the expiration of his clerkship, he entered into partnership with Mr. Aspinall, an attorney of considerable practice. But while he strictly attended to his professional duties, he did not lose sight of literature and the arts. Painting and statuary were objects of his regard; and in 1773, he read, at the society in Liverpool, an ode on those subjects: he also occasionally lectured there. When the projected abolition of the slave-trade became a subject of public discussion, he warmly interested himself in its success; and his "Scriptural Refutation of a pamphlet on the Licitness of the Slave Trade," and his "Wrongs of Africa," appeared in 1788. His ardent love of liberty induced him to hail the commencement of the French revolution, as an era of promised happiness to the human race; and under the influence of such feelings he composed his two songs, "O'er the vine-covered hills and gay regions of France," and "Millions be free," which were, for a time, highly popular both in France and England. In 1795, he brought out that great work on which his fame chiefly rests, entitled "The Life of Lorenzo de Medici," 2 vols. 4to.; soon after which he retired from the practice of an attorney, and entered himself as a student at Gray's Inn, with a view to the bar. During this period he had leisure for other studies; in 1798 he published "The Muse," a poem, from the Italian, and in 1805 appeared his second great work, "The Life and Pontificate of Leo X., the Son of Lorenzo de Medici," 4 vols. 4to. He also subsequently wrote several political pamphlets, and scientific treatises. Mr. Roscoe being attached to the Whig party, they supported him as a candidate to represent Liverpool, and after a severe contest with general Tarleton, in 1806, he was returned. His oratorical career, however, was brief, for after the dissolution of parliament in 1807, he retired from the representation. Some time previous to this, he had become a banker at Liverpool; but the house to which he belonged ultimately failed, and his private property was wrecked; his valuable library, prints, drawings, &c. producing about 8000*l*. Mr. Roscoe had long been considered as the head of the literary and scientific circles of his native town; and much of his time was spent in promoting the objects of its many noble public institutions. He died June 30, 1831.

ROSCOE, HENRY, youngest son of the preceding, was born in 1800; studied the law, and was called to the bar in 1828. Like his father, he united with his professional studies an extensive acquaintance with polite literature, and was an accomplished writer. Independent of many "Digests" of different branches of the law, he was the author of "Lives of eminent British Lawyers," in Lardner's Cyclopaedia; a Life of his father, 2 vols.; and the editor of "North's Lives." Died, 1835.

ROSE, GEORGE, a statesman and political writer, was born at Brechin, in Scotland, in 1744. He was a pursuer in the navy, but through the interest of the earl of Marchmont he was afterwards made keeper of the records in the exchequer. Here his talents for business were soon discovered, and he was appointed to superintend the publication of the Domesday Book, and to compile the Journals of the Lords. From this period his advancement was rapid; and when Mr. Pitt (whose friendship and full confidence he possessed) returned to power, Mr. Rose was made president of the board of trade, and treasurer of the navy. On the death of that minister he lost these situations; but when the administration, formed by Lord Grenville, retired, he resumed his former station, and continued in it till his death, which happened at Cuffnells, his seat in Hampshire, in 1818. He published "A brief Examination into the Increase of the Revenues, Commerce, and Navigation, of Great Britain;" "Considerations on the Debt due by the Civil List;" "Observations respecting the Public Expenditure, and the Influence of the Crown," &c.

ROSENMULLER, JOHN GEORGE, a celebrated German theologian, was professor of theology at Erlangen and Leipzig, and distinguished himself as a preacher, and by his activity in the cause of education. Born, 1736; died, 1815.—His son, ERNEST FREDERIC CHARLES, a distinguished Orientalist, was born at Leipzig, in 1768; in which university he became professor of Arabic, &c., and rendered important services to Oriental literature by various learned works.—Another son, JOHN CHRISTIAN, celebrated as an anatomist, was born at Hessberg, in 1771; became professor of anatomy and surgery at Leipzig; and died in 1820. He was the author of "Anatomico-Surgical Delineations;" a "Manual of Anatomy," &c.

ROSIN, JOHN, or ROSINUS, an antiquary, was born at Elsenach, in 1581, and died of the plague in 1626. He wrote "Antiquitatum Romanorum," a work of considerable value.

ROSS, or ROUSE, JOHN, called the antiquary of Warwick, of which town he was a native, studied at Balliol college, Oxford, and afterwards became canon of Osney. After travelling over the greater part of the kingdom to collect information respecting historical events, he settled at Guy's Cliffe, in Warwickshire, where he died, in 1491. He wrote a work on the "Antiquities of Warwick;" and the "History of our Kings;" and left a MS. on the "History of the Earls of Warwick," which is in the Bodleian library.

ROSS, ALEXANDER, a native of Aberdeen, was master of the grammar school at Southampton, and chaplain to Charles I. His works are very numerous; the most known of which is, a "View of all Religions." He was also the author of a curious performance, called "Virgilius Evangelizans," which is a cento on the life of Christ, taken wholly from Virgil. He died in 1654.

ROSS, ALEXANDER, a Scotch poet, born in Aberdeenshire, in 1699. He was educated at the Mareschal college, Aberdeen, and spent his life in discharging the duties of a parish schoolmaster at Lochlee, in Angushire. It was not till he was nearly seventy years of age that he first appeared as an author, when he published "Helenore, or the Fortunate Shepherdess," a poem which in the north of Scotland is nearly as popular as the writings of Ramsay and Burns. He was also the author of some favourite songs; and died in 1784.

ROSS, DAVID, a theatrical performer, at Drury-lane, cotemporary with Garrick. He was educated at Westminster school; and having the advantages of a good figure and a classical education, he acquired reputation both as a tragic and a comic actor. Died, 1790.

ROSS, JOHN, a learned prelate, was born in Herefordshire, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took the degree of D.D. In 1746 he published a pamphlet in defence of Dr. Middleton against the criticisms of Mr. Markland; and in 1749, an edition of "Cicero's Epistolæ ad Familiares," 2 vols. 8vo. He was presented to the vicarage of Frome, in Somersetshire; and, in 1778, advanced to the bishopric of Exeter. Died, 1792.

ROSSLYN, ALEXANDER WEDDERBURN, earl of, an eminent lawyer and statesman, was born in Scotland, in 1733. He received his education at Edinburgh, and was called to the bar in 1757. His application was indefatigable, and in 1763 he obtained a silk gown as king's counsel. Not long afterwards he was returned to parliament for Richmond. He joined Mr. Grenville in opposition to the administration, and distinguished himself by his eloquence and political firmness. In 1771 he was appointed solicitor-general; in 1778, attorney-general; and in 1780, chief justice of the Common Pleas, with the title of lord Loughborough. He adhered to the party of Mr. Fox when Mr. Pitt first came into power; but joined the administration, with many others, under the alarm produced by the French revolution in 1793, when he succeeded lord Thurlow as chancellor, which office he held till 1801, when he retired with the title of earl of Rosslyn; and died in 1805. In legal affairs, he was able, plausible, subtle, and eloquent; in his political capacity, a steady partisan, highly servicable to the cause he espoused. His lordship wrote a pamphlet, entitled, "Observations on the State of the English Prisons, and the Means of improving them."

ROSSLYN, JAMES ST. CLAIR ERSKINE, earl of, eldest son of lieutenant-general Sir Henry Erskine, and nephew of the preceding, succeeded his father as a baronet in 1763; and commenced his military career in 1778, as cornet in the 1st horse-guards. In 1782 he served on the staff in Ireland, as aid-de-camp to the lord lieutenant, and was subsequently appointed assistant-adjutant-general in that country. In 1783 he obtained a majority in the 8th light dragoons; and in 1792 the lieutenant-colonelcy of the 12th light dragoons. He served with that regiment at Toulon in 1793, and afterwards as adjutant-general to the forces in the Mediterranean, under Sir David Dundas and Sir Charles Stuart. In 1795 he obtained the rank of colonel, being appointed aid-de-camp to the King. He was employed as brigadier-general and adjutant-general to the British army in Portugal, from Nov. 1796, to the end of 1797. In 1798 he was appointed major-general, and was present at the reduction of Minorca. In 1803 he was appointed lieutenant-general, and placed on the staff in Ireland; in 1806 he was again appointed to serve in Portugal; was at the siege of Copenhagen in 1807; and in 1809 in the Zealand expedition. In 1810 his lordship received the colonelcy of the 9th lancers; and in June, 1814, he was appointed general. Sir James Erskine was a member of the House of Commons for twenty-three years before his accession to the peerage in 1805. In 1829 he was appointed keeper of the privy seal, and sworn a member of the privy council; and in December, 1834, he was lord president of the council in Sir Robert Peel's brief administration. The earl of Rosslyn was one of the most intimate friends of the duke of Wellington, and a firm upholder of conservative principles. He died in 1837, and was succeeded by his son, lord Loughborough.

motion from the emperor Paul, but was dismissed in disgrace; and subsequently, under Alexander, became governor of Moscow. He exercised an important influence over the campaign of 1812, and is charged by the French with having caused the conflagration of Moscow, which is the general opinion even in Russia, although Rostopchin has positively denied it. It is certain, however, that he took measures for the destruction of the magazines in that city; and should it be proved that his emissaries set fire to the ancient capital of Russia at his express commands, desperate as the measure may appear, it ever ought to be regarded as the act of a patriot, rather than that of an incendiary; inasmuch as it deprived the French invaders of a resting-place, and was the death-blow to Napoleon's boundless ambition. In 1814 count Rostopchin accompanied the emperor Alexander to the congress of Vienna; afterwards spent several years in France; and died at Moscow in 1826.

ROTGANS, LUKE, an eminent Dutch poet, was born in 1645, at Amsterdam, and died in 1710. He wrote the "Life of William III., king of England," an epic poem in eight books; and several other less important pieces.

ROTHERAM, JOHN, an English physician; author of a "Philosophical Enquiry into the Nature and Properties of Water." Died, 1787.

ROTHERAM, JOHN, a clergyman of the established church, was born in Cumberland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. He became a curate in Yorkshire, where he wrote a valuable treatise on the "Doctrine of Justification by Faith," for which the university conferred on him the degree of M.A.; and the bishop of Durham gave him the living of Houghton-le-Spring, where he died, in 1788. He also wrote, "An Apology for the Athanasian Creed;" "Sketch of the grand Argument for Christianity;" "Essay on the Soul and Body;" &c.

ROTHSCHILD, NATHAN MAYER, the greatest millionaire of the age, was one of five brothers, who, by their wealth, connexions, and financial skill, have for years exercised a great control over the monied, commercial, and political interests of Europe. Mayer Anselm, their father, and the founder of the house of Rothschild, was born at Frankfort. Though educated for the priesthood, he turned his attention to commerce; became eminent as a banker, and being trusted with the most important affairs by the landgrave of Hesse during the dominion of Napoleon in Germany, he executed his trusts so faithfully and successfully, that his house ranked among the most celebrated on the continent. Mayer Anselm died in 1812, leaving for inheritance to his sons the example of his life and wise counsels, an immense fortune, and unbounded credit; and they, by combining their operations, and always acting in concert, formed among themselves an invincible phalanx, whose power at one time was sufficient to influence the councils of a mighty empire, and to regulate its financial operations. Their names and residences were as follow: ANSELM, at Frankfort; SOLOMON, at Berlin and Vienna; NATHAN MAYER, at London; CHARLES, at Naples; and JAMES, at Paris. N. M. Rothschild, whose life we are recording, came to England in 1800, where he acted as agent for his father in the purchase of Manchester goods for the continent. Shortly afterwards, through the agency of his father, for the elector of Hesse Cassel and other German princes, he had large sums placed at his disposal, which he employed with such extraordinary judgment, that his means went on at a rapid rate of accumulation. Besides the essential co-operation of his brothers, he had agencies in almost every city in the world, with hosts of minor dependent capitalists who participated in his loans, who placed implicit confidence in the family, and were ready at all times to embark with them in any operation that was proposed. Nothing, therefore, was too great or extended for him. His great success in loan operations made it a matter almost of rivalry with all those states who wanted to borrow money, to obtain his co-operation; and yet he continued literally to steer clear of all the bad bargains which were made during the zenith of his career as a banker and financial merchant. His transactions in bullion and foreign exchanges were also on an immense scale, and not less lucrative, perhaps, than his foreign loans; in short, as they were not subject to the reverses which his loan contracts necessarily at times were, they might even be the most important branch of the whole concern. Mr. Rothschild had gone to Frankfort, to be present at the marriage of his eldest son, Lionel, with one of his cousins, a daughter of baron Anselm, when he was taken ill, and speedily died. His corpse was conveyed to London, and deposited in the burial-ground belonging to the German synagogue in Duke's-place, on the 6th of August, 1836; the funeral procession, consisting of thirty-six mourning, and forty private carriages, containing, besides the family and the most intimate friends of the deceased, many of the foreign ambassadors and English nobility, with the lord mayor, aldermen, &c., of London. As Mr. Rothschild's will furnished no statement of the amount of his property, upon that point public curiosity must remain ungratified; but there was an annuity of 20,000*l.*, clear of all incumbrance, secured to his widow, a lady whose talents in calculations and accounts had long been notorious, and who, as a true helpmate to her husband, in every sense, can scarcely be equalled. The sum of 100,000*l.* to each of his sons and daughters, is also specified, besides sundry legacies. He bequeathed nothing to public charities, servants, or dependants; entrusting the whole of this arrangement to the discretion of Mrs. Rothschild, in whom he placed the most unbounded confidence, and described as having been, in the strictest sense, a participator in all his joys and sorrows, from the first hour of their union.

ROTROU, JOHN DE, a French dramatic poet, was born in 1699, at Dreux; and died in 1850. He was the author of thirty-seven plays, many of which were highly popular; but he willingly bore public testimony to the superior merit of his rival Corneille. Being at Paris when a pestilential disorder broke out at Dreux, he hastened to afford relief to his fellow-citizens; but, three days after his arrival, in 1680, he died, the victim of his benevolent exertions.

ROUBILLIAC, Louis Francis, an eminent sculptor, was a native of Lyons, but came to England in the reign of George I., and was employed on several great works; among which are, the monument of the duke of Argyle, in Westminster abbey; the statue of Handel, at Vauxhall; that of Sir Isaac Newton, at Trinity college, Cambridge; and many other statues and monuments in various parts of the kingdom. He long stood at the head of his profession, and had also a talent for poetry. Died, 1768.

ROUCHER, John Anthony, a French poet and miscellaneous writer, was born at Montpellier, in 1745, and obtained from Turgot a place in the revenue department. When the revolution took place, he opposed the excesses of the more violent politicians; and for his moderation suffered by the guillotine in 1794. His principal work is "Les Morts," a poem, in 2 vols.

ROUELLE, William Francis, one of the earliest of the modern chemists in France, was born at Caen, in 1703. Having devoted great attention to chemical science, botany, and pharmacy, he settled at Paris as an apothecary, and afterwards became professor of chemistry at the royal botanic garden. He also held the office of inspector-general of pharmacy at the Hotel Dieu; and was a popular lecturer. Died, 1770.—His brother, Hilary Marinus, who was a clever experimental philosopher, assisted him in his lectures, and succeeded him as professor at the royal garden. Born, 1718; died, 1779.

ROUS, Francis, an English republican writer, was born at Hailton, in Cornwall, in 1579; educated at Oxford; and became a member of parliament in the reign of Charles I., when he was distinguished by his zeal for the establishment of a commonwealth, on the plan of the Hebrew republic. He was afterwards the tool of Cromwell, whom he compared to Moses, and, in consequence, was made one of his lords. He was also appointed provost of Eton, where he died, in 1639.

ROUSSEAU, Jacques, a French painter, born at Paris, in 1630. He studied in Italy, where he acquired great skill in his art; and, returning to France, was employed by Louis XIV. He afterwards came to England, and painted many excellent pictures. Died, 1694.

ROUSSEAU, John Baptist, a distinguished lyric poet, was born at Paris, in 1669. His father, though a shoemaker, gave him a liberal education, and at an early period he displayed a decided taste for poetry. In 1688 he became page to the French minister at the court of Denmark; after which he was secretary to marshal Tallard, in his embassy to England. In 1701 he was admitted into the Academy of Inscriptions; but in 1712 he was banished from France, on the charge of writing some grossly libellous verses, which, during the remainder of his life, and even in his last moments, he solemnly declared were forgeries, devised for his ruin. He then went to Switzerland, and afterwards to Vienna, under the patronage of prince Eugene. Some of his odes and epigrams are excellent, but among the latter are many which are unfit for perusal from their obscenity.

ROUSSEAU, Jean Jacques, one of the most eloquent writers and singular characters of the age, was the son of a watchmaker at Geneva, where he was born, in 1712. Like most of the citizens of that place, his father had a taste for literature: this he communicated to his son, whose love of marvellous adventure he not only encouraged by reading romances with him in his childhood, but he fostered the growth of those free principles which are the natural characteristics of a zealous republican. Rousseau neglected his school education; and, in his celebrated "Confessions," he represents himself, in his childhood, as of a warm and sensual temperament, and replete with mental and corporeal sensibility. He was first placed with an attorney, who soon dismissed him for negligence; he was then apprenticed to an engraver, from whom he ran away before he was sixteen, and wandered about for some time in Savoy, where he was saved from starving by a priest, and placed in a monastery. It was not long, however, before he found means to escape from this restraint; and a new scene awaited him. The noted Madame de Warens, a recent convert to the Catholic church, who had left her husband at Lausanne, for the pious work of proselytism, and who contrived to unite devotional feelings with amorous propensities, took him under her especial protection, caused him to be instructed in science and music, and continued to live with him, at intervals, on terms of more intimacy than delicacy, for about eight years. At length, being superseded by another gallant, he left his once agreeable benefactress; but was so fortunate as to obtain the place of secretary to the French ambassador in Venice, in 1742. But it was not till 1750 that he manifested his splendid literary talents. In that year he gained the prize offered by the academy of Dijon, on the question—

"Whether the revival of learning has contributed to the improvement of morals;"—taking the negative side of the question, it is said, at the suggestion of Diderot. From this period his pen became fertile and popular. He soon after brought out his "Devin du Village," a comic opera, of which he had himself composed the music. This piece was received with general favour, and the author was almost worshipped by the French; but the appearance of his celebrated "Letter on French Music" (1753), in which he pointed out its defects, excited a general storm. Singers and connoisseurs, who could not wield the pen, contributed to spread calumnies, pasquinades, and caricatures against the author, who retired to Geneva. By his change of religion he had lost the rights of a citizen. He now again embraced Protestantism, and was formally reinstated in the privileges of a free citizen of Geneva. From Geneva, Rousseau went to Chambery, where he wrote his essay, "Sur l'Inégalité parmi les Hommes," which excited still more sensation than his prize essay. In 1760 he published "Julie, ou la Nouvelle Heloise," a romance, of the most seductive description. His next work, entitled "Du Contrat Social," struck at the foundation of all governments, and therefore was prohibited, both in France and Switzerland. This treatise was followed, in 1762, by "Emilie, ou de l'Education;" which being of an immoral tendency, the book was anathematized by the archbishop of Paris, and ordered to be burnt by the parliament of Paris, and the authorities of Geneva. Obligated to flee from France and Switzerland, the author took shelter in the principality of Neuchâtel, where he published his "Letter to the Archbishop of Paris," and "Lettres de la Montagne," a remonstrance against the proceedings of the Genevese republic, the citizenship of which he renounced. Thenceforth his existence was passed in frequent changes of place, to escape real or fancied persecution, and in suspecting all his friends of insulting and conspiring against him. This was particularly the case with Hume, the historian, who secured for him a hospitable asylum in England, but whose friendship he solemnly renounced, and returned to France, where he died suddenly, in 1778. Rousseau was the author of many works besides those we have noticed, all of them marking his peculiar warmth and energy of style, and vigour of thinking. That he exercised a great influence over the theoretical opinions of the age, at the period of the French Revolution, if he did not greatly accelerate it, there can be little doubt; and that his writings have been highly injurious to society, there can be still less.

ROUSSET DE MISSY, JEAN, a political and miscellaneous writer, was born at Laon, in Picardy, in 1686; but quitting his country in consequence of being persecuted for his religion, he went and resided in the Netherlands. He was the proprietor and editor of "The Historical and Political Mercury;" and wrote and compiled many works, among which are, a "History of the Campaigns of Prince Eugene, the Duke of Marlborough, and the Prince of Orange," and an "Historical Account of the Grand Revolution in the United Provinces." Died, 1762.

ROWE, NICHOLAS, a poet and dramatist, whose father was a serjeant-at-law, was born in 1673, at Little Berkford, in Bedfordshire; was educated at Westminster school; and was intended for the bar; but on the death of his father he gave up all thoughts of the profession, and devoted himself to the cultivation of literature. His first tragedy, which he published when he was twenty-four, was "The Ambitious Stepmother," and its success gave him encouragement to proceed. It was followed by "Amerlane;" "The Fair Penitent;" "Ulysses;" "The Royal Convert;" "Jane Shore;" "Lady Jane Grey;" and a comedy called "The Biter." He also wrote miscellaneous "Poems," and the "Life of Shakspeare;" but his principal performance is a translation of "Lucan's Pharsalia." On the accession of George I. he was made poet-laureate, and he also obtained some government situations, the emoluments of which, with his paternal fortune, enabled him to live in a style of great respectability. He died in 1718, and was buried in Westminster abbey.

ROWE, ELIZABETH, a lady distinguished for her piety and learning, was the daughter of a dissenting minister named Singer, and was born at lichester, in 1674. She was married to Mr. Rowe, a young gentleman of considerable literary attainments, who died of a consumption a few years after; upon which event she retired to Frome, where she resided for the remainder of her life, with the exception of occasional visits to the countess of Hertford, and a few other friends of rank and talent, who highly valued her society. Her principal works are, "Friendship in Death;" "Letters, Moral and Entertaining, in Prose and Verse;" "The History of Joseph," a poem; and "Devout Exercises of the Heart." Died, 1737.

ROWE, THOMAS, a nonconformist divine, was born at North Petherwin, in Devonshire, and died about 1698. He wrote a pious book called "the Christian's Work."

ROWLANDS, HENRY, a Welsh divine and antiquary, was a native of Anglesey, of which island he published an elaborate account, entitled "Mona Restaurata." Died, 1722.

ROWLANDSON, THOMAS, an artist celebrated for his skill in caricature, was born in London, in 1736. He studied drawing at Paris; and, on his return, availed himself of the advantages which an attendance at the Royal Academy afforded him; rose to some degree of eminence in his profession; and died in 1827. Among his works are the plates to "Dr. Syntax;" "The Dance of Life;" and "The Dance of Death."

ROWLEY, WILLIAM, a dramatic writer in the reign of queen Elizabeth.—There was also a SAMUEL ROWLEY of the same period, who wrote two historical plays.

ROWLEY, WILLIAM, an eminent physician, born in London, in 1743. After having served abroad as a surgeon in the army, and made professional visits to Cuba and the Leeward Islands, he settled in London, where he obtained considerable reputation as a practitioner; though he somewhat marred his fame by his endeavours to oppose vaccine inoculation. He wrote "Schola Medicinæ universalis nova," and several tracts on medical subjects. Died, 1806.

ROWNING, JOHN, a mathematician and divine, who was fellow of Magdalen college, Cambridge, and rector of Anderbury, in Lincolnshire. He was the author of a "Compendious System of Natural Philosophy," 2 vols. Died, 1771, aged 72.

ROXBURGH, WILLIAM, a physician and botanist, was born at Craic, in Ayrshire, in 1739. He received his education at Edinburgh; served his time to a surgeon; went to India; and was appointed keeper of the botanical garden at Calcutta, where he formed an intimacy with Sir William Jones, and became a member of the Asiatic Society. Dr. Roxburgh made several important discoveries, particularly in the colouring matter of the lacca insect, and the caltivation of hemp in Bengal; for which he received three gold medals from the Society of Arts. His principal work is, "The Plants of the Coasts of Coromandel," 2 vols. 4to. He died at Edinburgh in 1815.

ROY, JULIAN LE, a celebrated clock and watch-maker, was born at Tours, in 1666. When very young, he showed a decided partiality for mechanical pursuits, and acquired the reputation of being a first-rate horologist. Died, 1759.—His son, PETER LE ROY, was watch-maker to the king, and died in 1785. He published "Mémoires pour les Horlogers de Paris;" "Etreennes Chronometriques," &c.—JULIAN DAVID, another son, became a member of the National Institute, and attached himself to architecture. He wrote "On the Ruins of the finest Monuments of Greece;" "On the Construction of Christian Temples," &c.

ROY, PETER CHARLES, a French satirist and dramatic poet, was born at Paris, in 1683. His principal pieces adapted for theatrical representation, are the operas of "Callirhoe," and "Semiramis;" the ballets of "The Elements," and "The Senses;" and the comedy of "The Captives," imitated from Plautus. His Satires against the members of the French Academy, prevented his gaining admission into that assembly; and he died in 1764.

ROZEE, Mademoiselle, an ingenious artist, was born at Leyden, in 1632. She neither used oil nor water colours in her pictures, but silk floss on the ground, disposed according to the different degrees of the bright and dark tints, which she applied with great judgment and taste. In this manner she executed historical subjects, landscapes, and portraits. Died, 1682.

ROZIER, FRANCIS, a botanist and agricultural writer, was born at Lyons, in 1734. He was an ecclesiastic, and obtained a priory; but devoted himself almost wholly to botany and natural history. He conducted the "Journal de Physique et Histoire Naturelle;" and was the author of a "Course of Agriculture;" "Elementary Demonstrations of Botany," &c. He was killed during the siege of Lyons, in 1793.

RUBENS, PETER PAUL, the most distinguished painter of the Flemish school, was born at Antwerp, in 1577. He received an excellent education; and after studying in his own country, he went to Italy, where he greatly improved himself after the works of the best masters, but chiefly Titian. While in Italy, he was employed by the duke of Mantua, not only as an artist, but on an embassy to Madrid. In 1629 he was employed by the princess Mary de' Medici to adorn the gallery of the Luxembourg with a series of paintings, illustrative of the principal scenes of her life. While thus engaged, he became known to the duke of Buckingham, who purchased his museum for ten thousand pounds. He was afterwards employed by the Infanta Isabella and the king of Spain in some important negotiations, which he executed with such credit as to be appointed secretary of the privy council. On going to England with a commission from the king of Spain, he obtained the favour of Charles I., who conferred on him the honour of knighthood.

While here he painted the Apotheosis of James I., and the picture of Charles I. as St. George; for which he was knighted, and received a chain of gold. He died at Antwerp, in 1640. Rubens, beyond all comparison, was the most rapid of the great masters; and, according to Sir Joshua Reynolds, he was the greatest master of the mechanical part of his art that ever existed.

RUBENS, ALBERT, son of the preceding, was born at Antwerp, in 1614. He succeeded his father as secretary to the council, and was greatly esteemed by the archduke Leopold, governor of the Low Countries. Died, 1657. He wrote "De Re Vestitaria Veterum;" "Regum et Imperatorum Romanum Numismata;" "De Vita Flavii Manlii Theodori," &c.

RUBINI, PETER, a physician, was born at Parma, in 1760. Having completed his studies at the university of his native city, he visited Paris, Edinburgh, &c., and was on his return made clinical professor at Parma. In 1816 the archduchess Maria Louisa appointed him her consulting physician and archiater. He wrote several treatises on fever, &c.; and died in 1819.

RUCELLAI, BERNARD, an Italian statesman and historian, born at Florence, in 1449. Having married the sister of Lorenzo de' Medici, he was promoted to the office of gonfalonier of justice, and employed on several important diplomatic missions. After the death of Lorenzo, he protected the members of the new Platonic Academy, for whose use he erected a palace, with gardens, embellished with noble monuments of ancient and modern art. Died, 1514.—His son JOHN, born in 1475, was sent ambassador to Venice in 1505; and in 1512 he took an active part in the measures which led to the restoration of the Medici family. He was afterwards papal nuncio in France, apostolical protonotary, and governor of the castle of St. Angelo. Died, 1525.

RUDBECK, OLAVUS, father and son, were both eminent Swedish physicians and natural philosophers. The elder, who died in 1702, wrote an able work, entitled "Exercitatio Anatomica;" he was also the author of a whimsical, but learned work, on the locality of Paradise, which he places in Sweden; and assigns that country as the common parent of the German, English, Danish, and even Greek and Latin nations. The son is known chiefly as the author of a work on the natural history of the Bible. Died, 1740.

RUDDIMAN, THOMAS, a distinguished grammarian and critic, was born in 1674, at Boyndie, in Banffshire; was educated at King's college, Aberdeen; became assistant keeper of the advocates' library at Edinburgh; set up a printing-office, in conjunction with his brother; was one of the founders of the earliest literary society in Scotland, in 1718; and died in 1757. His "Rudiments of the Latin Tongue," long used as an elementary book in schools, is the most popular of his productions; but he wrote other grammatical works, and was the editor of the works of George Buchanan, in Latin. He also established the "Caledonian Mercury."

Germany in 1773, founded the patrimonial power of his descendants, by whom the Austrian states are now ruled. He died in 1291, aged 73.

RUE, CHARLES DE LA, a French poet and popular preacher, was born at Paris, in 1643, and died in 1725. He was the author of several tragedies, both French and Latin; and edited the works of Virgil for the celebrated Delphin classics.

RUDING, ROBERTS, an English divine, born at Leicester, in 1731; became fellow of Merton college, Oxford; was presented to the living of Morden, in Surrey; and soon after was elected a fellow of the society of antiquaries, to whose Archæologia he was a contributor. He published "Annals of the Coinage of Britain and its Dependencies," in 4 vols. 4to. Died, 1820.

RUFFHEAD, OWEN, a miscellaneous writer, was born in London, about 1723; entered at the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar; published an edition of the statutes; and conducted a periodical paper, called the "Contest." He was also the author of the "Life of Pope," &c. Died, 1769.

RUFFI, ANTHONY DE, a French lawyer and historian, was born at Marseilles, in 1807; became a counsellor of state; and died in 1689. He wrote "A History of Marseilles;" also a "History of the Courts of Provence;" and "The Life of Gaspard de Simiane."—His son, LOUIS ANTHONY, continued his father's "History of Marseilles;" and published some further historical illustrations connected therewith. Died, 1734.

RUFINUS, by some called TORANIUS, a priest of Aquileia, in the fourth century. He became so attached to St. Jerome, that he accompanied him to the East; but being persecuted by the Arians under Valens, he was banished into Palestine, where he founded a monastery on Mount Olivet, and employed himself in translating Greek authors into Latin. His version of Origen gave such offence to his old acquaintance, Jerome, that he wrote bitterly against him, and Rufinus was cited to Rome by pope Anastasius, who condemned his translation; upon which he retired to Sicily, where he died, about 410. The works of "Josephus;" the "Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius;" and the writings of "Gregory Nazianzen," and "St. Basil," were also translated by Rufinus.

RUFUS, a physician of Ephesus, flourished in the reign of Trajan. He discovered the origin of the nerves of the brain, and made observations on the crystalline lens of the eye. He also wrote treatises on the diseases of the urinary organs, &c.; and was esteemed by Galen to have been one of the ablest physicians who had preceded him.

RUGENDAS, GEORGE PHILIP, a celebrated battle-painter, born at Augsburg, in 1666. Such was his zeal for the advancement of his art, that during the siege of Augsburg he freely exposed himself amidst the fire and carnage, that he might be able to sketch the scenes around him. Died, 1742.

RUGGLE, GEORGE, a dramatic artist, born at Lavenham, in Suffolk, in 1573. He was a fellow of Clare hall, Cambridge, and author of the famous Latin comedy, called "Ignoramus," performed in that university before James I. in 1614.

RUHS, FREDERIC, a German historian, born in Swedish Pomerania, in 1780; studied at Göttingen; was made professor at Griefswald; wrote a "History of Sweden," 4 vols.; afterwards became a professor of history at Berlin; and died at Leghorn, in 1820.

RUINART, THIERRY, a French theological writer, was born at Rheims, in 1657. He became a Benedictine, and was the associate of Mabillon, in his literary labours. He also printed an edition of the works of Gregory of Tours; a volume on the Martyrs of the first four centuries; and other books on Ecclesiastical History. He died in 1707.

RULHIÈRE, CLAUDIUS CARLOMAN DE, a French historian, was born in 1735, at Bondi, near Paris. After having been in the army, and attained the rank of aid-de-camp to marshal Richelieu, then governor of Guienne, he went with the minister plenipotentiary, Breteuil, to St. Petersburg, as his secretary and confidential friend, and there witnessed the dethronement of Peter III. and the elevation of Catharine II., of which, on his return to France, he published an account. He was also employed by the government to write a "History of the Anarchy in Poland," 4 vols. Died, 1791.

RUMFORD, Count, so called from the title conferred on him by the elector of Bavaria, but whose real name was BENJAMIN THOMPSON, was born in Woburn, New England, in 1752. He acquired, when young, a knowledge of natural philosophy, and employed himself as a teacher, till he was raised to independence by an advantageous marriage, when he became a major in the militia of his native province; and when the war took place between Great Britain and her colonies, his local knowledge enabled him to render services of importance to the English commanders. He went to England, and, as the reward of his services, obtained a situation in the foreign office, under lord George Germaine. Towards the close of the war, he was sent to New York, where he raised a regiment of dragoons, of which he was appointed colonel, and, returning to England in 1784, received the honour of knighthood. He was for some time one of the under-secretaries of state. Soon after, he went to the continent, and, through the recommendation of the prince of Deux-Ponts (afterwards king of Bavaria), entered into the service of the reigning elector-palatine and duke of Bavaria, when he effected many important and useful reforms in both the civil and military departments of the state. As the reward of his services, he received various orders of knighthood, was made a lieutenant-general, and created count Rumford. He left Bavaria in 1790, and returned to England, where he employed himself in making experiments on the nature and application of heat, and on other subjects of economical and philosophical research.

He likewise suggested the plan, and assisted in the foundation of the Royal Institution, which led to other establishments of a similar description. In 1602, he removed to Paris, in the neighbourhood of which he took up his residence; married the widow of the celebrated Lavoisier; and died in 1814.

RUMPH, GEORGE EVERARD, a botanist, was born at Haden, in 1637. He took his doctor's degree in physic, after which he went as consul and senior merchant to Amboyna, where he made valuable botanical collections, the results of which were published by Burman, in 1751, under the title of "Herbarium Amboinense."

RUNCIMAN, ALEXANDER, a Scotch painter, was the son of an architect, and born at Edinburgh, in 1736. After serving his time to a portrait painter, he went to Rome with his brother John, a most promising artist, who died in Italy. Alexander continued his studies with diligence, and on his return home was employed by Sir James Clerk, to decorate his house with scenes from Osian. His best pictures are, an "Ascension," in the episcopal chapel at Edinburgh; his "Leary;" "Andromeda;" and "Agrippina." Died, 1785.

RUNNINGTON, CHARLES, serjeant-at-law, was born in Hertfordshire, in 1751; and in 1766 he was placed with a special pleader, who employed him on a digest of the law of England. In 1778 he was called to the bar; in 1787 he was made serjeant-at-law; and in 1815, appointed commissioner for the relief of insolvent debtors, which office he resigned in 1819. He published "Hale's History of the Common Law," 3 vols.; "Gilbert's Law of Ejectments;" and "Ruffhead's Statutes at Large," 4 vols. 4to. Died, 1821.

RUPERT, or ROBERT OF BAVARIA, prince, the third son of Frederic, king of Bohemia, by Elizabeth, daughter of James I., was born in 1619, and received a military education. He commanded the cavalry of Charles I. during the civil war, and on various occasions manifested the most daring valour; but his impetuosity and imprudence more than counterbalanced the effects of his bravery; and, at length, having surrendered Bristol to general Fairfax, by whom it was besieged, the king dismissed him from his service. The prince, however, was more successful as a naval commander, particularly after the Restoration, in the great Dutch war; on the conclusion of which he led a retired life, occupied wholly in scientific pursuits. He invented a composition, called "prince's metal;" improved the strength of gunpowder; found out a method of fusing black lead; and discovered the art of engraving in mezzotinto. He was an active member of the board of trade; and to his influence is ascribed the establishment of the Hudson's Bay Company, of which he was governor. Died, 1683.

RUSH, BENJAMIN, a celebrated American physician, was born in 1745, at Bristol, in Pennsylvania; was educated at Princeton college; took his degree at Edinburgh, in 1768; was chosen a member of congress for Pennsylvania, in 1776; was appointed professor of medicine and clinical practice at the university; and died in 1813. During the devastation caused by the yellow fever in 1793, Dr. Rush highly distinguished himself; and his history of that epidemic is a work of great value. He also wrote "Medical Inquiries and Observations;" and "Essays, Literary, Moral, and Philosophical."

RUSHWORTH, JOHN, an historian, was born in Northumberland, in 1607; studied at Oxford; and became a barrister. In 1640 he was appointed assistant-clerk of the House of Commons; was much employed in negotiations during the civil wars; and after the Restoration he became secretary to the lord-keeper Bridgeman. His "Historical Collections," in 8 vols., is a laborious and highly useful compilation.

RUSSEL, WILLIAM, fifth earl, and first duke, of Bedford, was born in 1614; received his education at Magdalen college, Oxford; was a member of the long parliament in 1640, and commanded the reserve of horse at the battle of Edge-hill; but in 1643 he joined the royal standard, and fought with great bravery at the battle of Newbury. He was not, however, in favour with the royal party, and he retired to private life till the Restoration, when he assisted at the coronation, and was elected a knight of the garter. He also attended the coronation of William and Mary, who, in 1689, exalted him to the rank of marquis of Tavistock and duke of Bedford. Died, 1700.

RUSSEL, WILLIAM, lord, third son of the preceding, was a distinguished supporter of constitutional liberty, and was born about 1611. In 1679, when Charles II. found it necessary to ingratiate himself with the Whigs, lord Russel was appointed one of the members of the privy council. He soon, however, found that his party was not in the king's confidence, and the recall of the duke of York, without their concurrence, induced him to resign. Although his temper was mild and moderate, his fear of a Catholic succession induced him to take decisive steps in the promotion of the exclusion of the duke of York. In June, 1680, he went publicly to Westminster-hall, and, at the court of King's Bench, presented the duke as a recusant; and, on the November following, carried up the exclusion bill to the House of Lords, at the head of two hundred members of parliament. The king dissolved the parliament, evidently resolved to govern thenceforward without one; and arbitrary principles were openly avowed by the partisans of the court. Alarmed at the state of things, many of the Whig leaders favoured strong expedients, in the way of counteraction, and a plan of insurrection was formed for a simultaneous rising in England and Scotland. Among these leaders, including the dukes of Monmouth and Argyll, the lords Russel, Essex, and Howard, Algernon Sidney, and Hampden, different views prevailed; but lord Russel looked only to the exclusion of the duke of York. He was, however, accused of having engaged in "the Rye-house Plot," which had for its object the assassination of the king on his return from Newmarket; and on this pretext he was committed to the Tower, tried, condemned, and executed in July, 1683, being then in the 42d year of his age. After the Revolution, the proceedings against him were annulled.

RUSSEL, lady RACHEL, wife of the preceding, was daughter of the earl of Southampton, and the widow of lord Vaughan. In 1667 she was married to lord William Russell; and the affectionate zeal with which she assisted him when in trouble, and the magnanimity of her behaviour after his death, have excited for her a general feeling of respect and sympathy. Being refused counsel upon his trial, and allowed only an amanuensis, she stood forth in that capacity, and took down the notes. She survived his lordship forty years, which period she occupied in the exercise of pious and social duties. Her "Letters," which do equal credit to her understanding and her heart, have been often reprinted. Died, 1723.

RUSSEL, EDWARD, earl of Orford, a British admiral, was born in 1631. He became gentleman of the bed-chamber to James, duke of York; but on the execution of his cousin, lord William Russell, he retired from court, and was an active promoter of the Revolution. He gained the celebrated battle of La Hogue, in 1692; commanded subsequently in the Mediterranean; was first lord of the admiralty; and died in 1727.

RUSSEL, WILLIAM, an historical writer, was born in the county of Middletham, in 1746. He was brought up as a printer, which business he for a time followed, and then became an author by profession. His works are, "A History of America," 2 vols. 4to.; "A History of Modern Europe," 4 vols. 8vo.; and "A History of Ancient Europe," which was completed in 3 vols. by Dr. Coote, the work being unfinished at his death, in 1793.

RUSSELL, Sir HENRY, bart., a privy-councillor, and formerly chief-justice in Bengal, was born in 1731; called to the bar in 1753, and soon afterwards appointed one of the judges of the supreme court of Calcutta; knighted in 1797, and made chief-justice of Bengal; created a baronet in 1812; and retired from the Indian service, with a pension of 2000*l.* per annum, in 1815. Died, 1836.

RUST, GEORGE, a learned prelate, was born at Cambridge. He became fellow of Christ's college; but, at the Restoration, he went over to Ireland, and was preferred to the deanery of Connor, and the rectory of Magee. He was afterwards made bishop of Down, where he died in 1670.

RUTHERFORD, DANIEL, a natural philosopher and physician, was born at Edinburgh, in 1749; studied in that university; succeeded Dr. John Hope as professor of botany and keeper of the botanic garden, in 1780; and died in 1819. Dr. Rutherford was the discoverer of nitrogen, and was the first who represented oxygen gas (then called vital air) as the necessary constituent of all acids.

RUTHERFORTH, THOMAS, an English divine, was born at Papworth Everard, in Cambridgeshire, in 1712; was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge; where, in 1743, he was appointed professor of divinity; and died, rector of Barley, in Hertfordshire, with the archdeaconry of Essex, in 1771. His most important works are, "A System of Natural Philosophy," 2 vols.; "An Essay on the Nature and Obligations of Virtue;" "A Discourse on Miracles;" "Institutes of Natural Law," 2 vols.; and "Sermons."

RUTHVEN, EDWARD SOUTHWELL, the friend and fellow-member of Mr. O'Connell for Dublin in the parliament of 1835; whose return, after undergoing a scrutiny of a committee, unusually protracted and expensive, was declared to be illegal, and Messrs. Hamilton and West seated in their stead. Mr. Ruthven, however, did not live to hear the verdict, the labours of the committee not being brought to a close till six weeks after his decease. Died, 1824.

RUYSCH, FREDERIC, an eminent anatomist, was born in 1638, at the Hague, and died in 1731. His anatomical works, which contain many new discoveries, have been printed in 4 vols. 4to.—His son HENRY published "Theatrum Animalium," 2 vols. folio.

RUYSCH, RACHEL, one of the most celebrated painters of fruit and flower pieces, was born at Amsterdam, in 1664, and died in 1750. Her pictures are distinguished for truth and splendour of colouring, united with great finish.

RUYSDAAL, JACOB, a celebrated Dutch painter, was born at Haarlem, in 1636. He stood unrivalled in the representation of woods, groves, and pieces of water, particularly cataracts; and died in 1681.

RUYTER, MICHAEL ADRIAN, a gallant Dutch admiral, was born in 1607, at Flushing. He entered the naval service when he was only eleven years old, and by dint of bravery and skill, rose to the summit of his profession. On many occasions he nobly distinguished himself when engaged against the English, especially in the terrible battle fought in February, 1653, near the mouth of the Channel, when Blake commanded the English, and Van Tromp and Ruyter the Dutch. In the reign of Charles II., Ruyter gained an advantage over prince Rupert and Monk; but, two months afterwards, another battle was fought, in which the Dutch were defeated. The following year, however, he avenged himself, by riding triumphantly in the Thames, and destroying several English men of war at Sheerness. He died in the port of Syracuse, in consequence of a wound received a few days before, when engaging with the French fleet off Messina.

RYDER, Sir DUDLEY, an eminent English lawyer, was descended from an ancient Yorkshire family, and born in 1691. He held the office of attorney-general from 1736 to 1754; was made lord chief justice; and died in 1756.

RYDER, the Honourable and Right Rev. HENRY, D.D., bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, was the youngest son of the late earl of Harrowby, and born in 1777. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he graduated; and was, in 1801, presented by the king to the rectory of Lutterworth. In 1612 he was appointed to the deanery of Wells; in 1615 he was consecrated bishop of Gloucester; and in 1624 translated to the see of Lichfield and Coventry. Dr. Byder was a prelate of great and consistent piety, but not distinguished as a writer. Died, 1636.

RYLAND, WILLIAM WYNNE, an engraver, was born in London, in 1732. He attained great excellence in his art; but his end was truly melancholy, for, in order to extricate himself from some embarrassments, he, in 1762, committed a forgery on the East India Company, and was tried and executed the year following.

RYLAND, JOHN, a dissenting minister, who kept an academy, and officiated many years to a Baptist congregation at Northampton. Mr. Ryland published "The Christian Student and Pastor;" "Elements of Mechanics;" "The Preceptor;" and several tracts and sermons. He died at Enfield in 1792.

RYMER, THOMAS, a critic and antiquary, was a native of Yorkshire; studied at Cambridge and at Gray's Inn; and, succeeding Shadwell, in 1692, as royal historiographer, employed the opportunities afforded him by his office, to make a valuable collection of public treaties, which he began to publish in 1704, under the title of "Fœdera, Conventiones, et cujuscuque Generis Acta publica, inter Reges Angliæ, et alios Prin-cipes," 15 vols., folio, five more being added by Robert Sanderson. He also wrote some poetical pieces; and left an unpublished collection relating to English history, in 38 volumes, now in the British Museum. Died, 1713.

RYSBRACH, JOHN MICHAEL, an eminent statuary, was born at Antwerp, in 1694. He came to England early in life, and derived considerable reputation and profit from the exercise of his art. Westminster abbey, and other cathedral churches contain specimens of his abilities; among which should be noticed the monuments of Sir Isaac Newton and the duke of Marlborough. Died, 1770.

RZEWSKY, or RZEWIESKY, WENCESLAUS, a Polish nobleman, born in 1705. After travelling through the principal countries of Europe, he filled various high offices, among which was that of grand general of the crown, to which he was appointed on the invasion of Poland by the Tartars, in 1739. Having opposed the election of Stanislaus Poniatowski to the throne, he gave great offence to the empress, and was subjected to six years imprisonment in Russia. As he possessed an extensive acquaintance with natural philosophy, and indulged his taste for literature, music, &c., he employed himself during his confinement in these pursuits. He translated the Odes of Horace, and was the author of some poems, dramas, and other works. Died, 1779.

SAA DE MIRANDA, FRANCISCO, a Portuguese poet of some celebrity. He wrote two comedies, besides a number of pastorals, sonnets, &c. Born, 1495; died, 1558.

SAA, EMANUEL DE, a Portuguese Jesuit, who was employed by Pius V. on a new edition of the Bible. Born 1530; died, 1596.

SAAD EDDIN MOHAMMED BEN HASSAN, a Turkish historian of great eminence, and preceptor of sultan Amurath III. He was well known under the name of Khodja Effendi, and became appointed to the office of mufti to the sultan, which he held till his death in 1600.

SAADIAS-GAON, a learned Jewish rabbi, was born at Pothim, in Egypt, 692. He presided over the academy at Sora, near Babylon; from which, for a short time only, he was deposed for denying the doctrine of the metempsychosis. He wrote many works; and died in 774.

SAAS, JOHN, a learned French ecclesiastic, and writer on bibliography, was born at Rouen in 1703. He was very zealous in defence of the privileges of his church; and died in 1774.

SAAVEDRA FAXARDO, DIEGO DE, a Spanish writer and diplomatist, was born at Algeziras, in Murcia, in 1584. He became secretary to the embassy at Rome; and afterwards was appointed sole agent for Spain at the papal court. He also assisted at some diets in Switzerland, and enjoyed for his reward, the collar of St. Jago, a canonry of the church, and a seat in the council-board for the Indies. He died in 1648.

SABAS, the head of the sect of the Mes-sallians, in the third century, whose doctrine enforced a strict adherence to every part of the Scriptures; and who, literally interpreting the divine instruction, "Labour not for the meat that perisheth," refused to engage in any employment.

SABATAI SEVA, a Jewish impostor of Smyrna, who, in 1686, arrogated to himself the character of the Messiah. He obtained such belief, and so numerous were his adherents, that the jealousy of the Turkish government caused him to be seized and sent a prisoner to Constantinople. He here saved his life at the expense of his religion, and turned Mahometan. This pretender was the last of the false Messiahs.

SABATIER, ANTOINE, or SABATIER DE CASTRES, was born at Castres, in 1742. He was a very celebrated French writer, and was early connected with Helvetius and the philosophical party of the literati; but he soon left these, and showed his opposition to them in his work, "Les Trois siècles de la Littérature Française," &c., which procured him many enemies, but brought him into notice. He next advocated religion and morality, but his practices being so discreditable, he emigrated at the Revolution. On the restoration of the king he obtained but a comparatively small income, and continued his satire on the court and clergy, till sickness reduced him to find alleviation in the house of the Charitable Sisters at Paris, where he died in 1817. Among his numerous works are, "Les Siècles Français, ou Dictionnaire Mythologique, Heroïque, Politique, Littéraire, et Géographique de l'Antiquité Française," 9 vols., and "Les Caprices de la Fortune," &c.

SABATIER, or SABATHIER, PIERRE, a learned Benedictine, born at Poitiers, in 1682. His great work was an edition of all the ancient Latin versions of the Bible, 3 vols. folio. Died, 1742.

SABATIER, RAPHAEL BIENVENU, a celebrated surgeon of Paris, where he was born in 1739, and died in 1811. He wrote many clever works on medicine and surgery.

SABBATINI, ANDREA, or ANDREA DEL SALERNO, the first painter of the Neapolitan school, was born about 1480. He studied under Raphael, and imitated his manner with great success. He died at Naples, in 1545.—LORENZO, called also Lorenzo di Bologna, was another admired artist of the sixteenth century, and his pictures are frequently mistaken for those of Andrea. He died at Rome, in 1577.

SABBATINI, P. LUD. ANT., known as Sabbatini of Padua, was a distinguished professor of music, and writer also on that science. Died, 1608.

SABELLICUS, MARCUS ANTONIUS COCCUS, an Italian historian and critic, was born in the Roma Campagna, in 1436. He became professor of eloquence, at Udino, and subsequently at Venice, where he obtained a pension for writing the History of the Republic. He died in 1506. His other works, moral, philosophical, and historical, have been printed in 4 vols. folio.

SABELLIUS, a heretic, born at Ptolemais, in Libya, in the third century, was a disciple of Noctus of Smyrna. He advanced the doctrine of Unity in the Deity, declaring the Son and the Holy Ghost to be mere qualities. These tenets obtained many proselytes, and met with great success till the opposition of St. Denys caused them to be formally condemned.

SABINE, JOSEPH, F.R.S., honorary secretary of the horticultural society, treasurer and vice president of the zoological society, &c., was born in 1770; and was originally intended for the bar. In 1808 he was appointed inspector-general of taxes, which office he held for twenty-six years; and when it was abolished, in 1835, government allowed him a compensation pension of 350*l.* per annum; seven of his colleagues having retired, eighteen years before, on 400*l.* Mr. Sabine was a highly talented man; and for many years previous to his death, which occurred in January, 1837, his time was almost wholly engrossed in managing the affairs of the scientific institutions of which he was a functionary.

SABINUS, GEORGE, in German "Schellen," a modern Latin poet, was born in Brandenburg, in 1508. He studied at Wittenberg, when but fifteen years old, under Melancthon, whose eldest daughter he ultimately married. He became professor of the belles lettres at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder; and afterwards rector of the new university of Koulberg. His great reputation made him known to the emperor Charles V., who canonized him, and employed him on several embassies. Died, 1560.

SACCHETTI, FRANCIS, an Italian novelist, was born at Florence about 1338. His talent and connections caused him to fill several offices in the republic. Died, 1416.

SACCHI, ANDREA, an eminent painter of Rome, where he was born in 1594. He studied under Albano; and, assisted by the patronage of pope Urban VIII. his talent raised him to great eminence. The churches and palaces of Rome contain many specimens of his skill and genius. Died, 1664.

SACCHINI, FRANCIS, a Jesuit and writer, was born at Perugia, in 1570; and died at Rome, in 1635.

SACCHINI, ANTONIO MARIA GASPARD, a celebrated Italian composer, was born at Naples, in 1735. He studied under Durante, and, after being employed in Rome, Venice, and several other cities of Italy with great eclat, he went to London, where he composed several operas. Meeting some opposition there, he left for Paris, where he reached the height of his fame, and obtained a pension from the queen. He died in 1788, leaving upwards of eighty dramatic pieces.

SACHEVERELL, HENRY, an English divine, was educated at Oxford, where, in 1706, he obtained the degree of D.D. In 1705 he was appointed preacher at St. Saviour's, Southwark; during which period he preached two famous sermons, the objects of which were to create alarm for the safety of the church, and to excite hostility against the dissenters. Being impeached in the House of Commons, he was sentenced to be suspended from preaching for three years. This persecution, however, established the fortune of Sacheverell, who was collated to a living near Shrewsbury; and, the same month that his suspension terminated, was appointed to the valuable rectory of St. Andrew, Holborn. His abilities, however, were poor and contemptible. Died, 1724.

SACHS, JOHN, or HANS SACHS, was one of the celebrated early German poets, termed master-singers. His father was a tailor in Nuremberg, where he was born, in 1494. He himself began life as a shoemaker, but becoming a pupil of Nußmebeck, a master-singer, he added that of poetry to the other craft. By indefatigable application to the ancient German and Italian bards, he became very eminent as a writer; so much so, indeed, as to be esteemed the inventor of tragedy and comedy among the Germans. He died in 1576.

SACKVILLE, GEORGE, Viscount, a soldier and statesman, was the third son of the first duke of Dorset, and was born in 1716. He was educated at Westminster, and afterwards at Trinity college, Dublin, when his father was lord-lieutenant of Ireland. Entering the army, he distinguished himself at the battles of Dettingen and Fontenoy; and in 1758 he was made a lieutenant-general; but the year following he fell into disgrace for his conduct at the battle of Minden, where he commanded under prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, whose orders to advance with his troops during the engagement he disobeyed. His behaviour being, at home, attributed to cowardice, he was tried by a court-martial, and sentenced to be dismissed from the service. Under the administration of lord Bute, however, he was restored to favour, and in 1775 he was appointed colonial secretary of state, which he held during the American war. On quitting office, in 1782, he was created viscount. On succeeding to the estates of lady Germaine, for a long time he went under that name. He died in 1788; and, from his talent, and the bias of his opinions, the "Letters of Junius" have been attributed to his pen.

SADE, JAMES FRANCIS PAUL ALPHONSE DE, a native of France, was born in 1706. After becoming vicar-general of the archbishops of Toulouse and Narbonne, he was employed on a mission from Languedoc to the court at Paris; and in 1744 he was nominated abbot of Ebreville, in Auvergne. After the lapse of eight years, he retired to Saumane, where he devoted himself to study and to literary pursuits; and died in 1778.

SADE, DONATIAN ALPHONSE FRANCIS, count de, nephew of the above, was born in Paris, in 1740. He was educated at the college of Louis le Grand, and then entered the army. He was one of the most abandoned and profligate of the French nobility. At length, however, his friends terminated his infamous career, by procuring his confinement in the maisonette at Charenton, where he died, in 1814. He had great talent, but wrote only the most licentious novels.

SADEEL, ANTHONY, a learned French Huguenot and theological writer, was born of a noble family, in the Maçonnais, in 1534. At an early age he preached the reformed persuasion; for which, however, he was imprisoned, but obtained his release through the interposition of his royal patron. Henri Quatre made him his chaplain, and he attended that monarch in some of his campaigns; but, on the reconciliation of Henri to the church of Rome, he retired to Geneva, where he was chosen pastor and Hebrew professor. He died in 1591; and his works were printed the following year.

SADELER, JOHN, a distinguished engraver, was born at Brussels, in 1836. He executed many masterly works, and was honoured by the patronage of the elector of Bavaria. Died, 1860.—RAPHAEL, brother and pupil of the above, was born in 1838. He worked in conjunction with his relative, and executed upwards of five hundred religious engravings.—GILSA, who was the nephew and pupil of the above brothers, excelled both of them in correctness and taste.

SADI, SHEIK MOHAMEDIN, one of the most celebrated poets of Persia, was born at Shiraz, in 1175; and died in the 120th year of his age. He studied at Bardad, and pursued a religious course of life under the direction of the famous Sophi Abd al Kadir Ghilani, whom he accompanied on a pilgrimage to Mecca. He fought against the infidels, and carried his arms into India and Asia Minor. Being, however, taken prisoner by the Turks, he was put to work on the fortifications of Tripoli; but was redeemed by a merchant of Aleppo, who gave him his daughter in marriage, with a dowry. Towards the close of his life he built a hermitage near the walls of Shiraz, where he passed his time in exercises of piety; and his tomb, on the spot where he had lived, was long visited by the admirers of his genius and devotion. He wrote "Gullistan, or the Garden of Roses," and other works.

SADLER, JOHN, a political writer, was born in Shropshire, in 1618. He was educated at Cambridge, and was a favourite of Oliver Cromwell's. He published a work, entitled, "Rights of the Kingdom, or Customs of our Ancestors." Died, 1674.

SADLER, or SADLIER, Sir RALPH, an English statesman, was born in 1567, at Hackney, in Middlesex. In early life he enjoyed the patronage of Cromwell, earl of Essex, who introduced him to Henry VIII., in consequence of which he was employed in many political affairs, and had a share in the dissolution of the monasteries, partaking also of the spoil. He was sent on some embassies to Scotland; and at the battle of Musselburgh, in that kingdom, Sir Ralph greatly distinguished himself, and was made a knight banneret in reward of his services. At the accession of Elizabeth he was again sent to Scotland; and when the unfortunate Mary came to England, she was committed to his care. He died in 1597. A collection of his "Letters and Negotiations" was published in 1809, in 2 vols. 4to., with a memoir, written by Sir Walter Scott.

SADLER, WILLIAM WINDHAM, a well-known aeronaut and chemist. He was in the establishment of the first gas-company in Liverpool, where he also erected accommodations for warm, medicated, and vapour baths. During this period, however, he practised aerostation, and made thirty aerial voyages, in one of which he crossed the Irish Channel from Dublin to Wales. In the last attempt from Blackburn, in Lancashire, Sept. 30, 1824, while descending, the car of his balloon struck against a chimney, and violently precipitated him to the earth and caused his death, aged 28.

SADLER, MICHAEL THOMAS, F.R.S., was born at Snelston, in Derbyshire, in 1780; and it may be truly said of him that he was a scholar, an orator, a gentleman, and a philanthropist. He had, however, chiefly devoted himself to mercantile pursuits at Leeds, in connection with a brother, until 1829, when he was invited by the electors of Newark-upon-Trent to become a candidate for the representation of that borough in parliament, and for which he was ultimately returned, in opposition to Mr. Ser-

JEANT WYLDE. At the general election (1830) he was again returned for Newark; and, in the ensuing year, for Aldborough, Yorkshire. His political opinions were generally more conscientious than popular, and he never failed, if not persuasively, yet honestly and fearlessly, to express them. His chief object in parliament appeared to be nothing less than conferring the largest portion of substantial benefits upon the great mass of the poor, for the agricultural portion of whom he sought to obtain parliamentary aid, to provide them with allotments of ground, &c.; while for Ireland, in the distresses of which he felt a deep sympathy, he eloquently urged the justice and necessity of a well-regulated system of poor laws. To spare the sacrifice of life among the children employed in the manufactories was another of his great objects; and on each he wrote as forcibly and clearly as he had spoken. To his perseverance the amelioration of the condition of these poor children is owing; since, although his benevolent intentions were frustrated in the first instance, by the too powerful opposition of those whose cupidity rendered them deaf to any appeal against their pecuniary interests, yet his impressive eloquence had so thoroughly aroused the public to a sense of the evil, that, in the ensuing session of parliament, the late opponents of the measure were compelled to carry a similar bill to that which had been proposed by himself. His parliamentary exertions, and the intense anxiety they occasioned, are said to have been the primary cause of his death, which occurred in July, 1835, while he was in Ireland. Mr. Sadler's two principal works were, "Ireland, its Evils, and their Remedies," and his "Law of Population," in which the Malthusian doctrines were impugned and refuted.

SADOC, a learned Jewish doctor, in the third century B.C. He was the disciple of Antigonus Sochemus, president of the Sanhedrim. Joining Balthusas, a fellow-disciple, he denied the resurrection, and from him and his name originated the sect of Sadducees. His followers disclaimed also the existence of angels and the doctrine of predestination. They believed there to be no distinct principle like the soul, and, in consequence, opposed the idea of a future state of rewards and punishments.

SADOLET, JAMES, a learned cardinal, was born at Modena, in 1477. His father was a professor of jurisprudence at Ferrara, where he received his education, and attained great celebrity by his Latin poetry, rhetoric, and philosophy. He went to Rome, where, on the election of Leo X. to the pontificate, he was made one of his secretaries; and soon after bishop of Carpentras. He suffered much from the vicissitudes of war, and was several times compelled to quit the city, leaving his palace, &c. to the plunder of the soldiery. Clement VII. restored him to his office; and the succeeding pontiff, Paul III., again recalled him to Rome, raised him to the purple, and employed him on many negotiations. Died, 1547.

SAEMUND, SIGURSSON, a celebrated Icelandic priest, poet, legislator, and historian in the 11th century. He had a share in forming the code of ecclesiastical laws; wrote a History of Norway; and was the compiler of that Scandinavian collection of poetry, termed "Edda," printed at Copenhagen, in 1787, 4to. He died in 1135, at the age of eighty.

SAGE, BALTHAZAR GEORGE, an eminent natural philosopher, was born at Paris, in 1740. Mineralogy and chemistry were his favourite pursuits, and the study of them he much promoted. Died, 1824.

ST. ANGE, ANGE FRANÇOIS FARIAU DE, a French poet, born at Blois, in 1747; and died, a member of the Institute, in 1810. He translated the "Metamorphoses," with other poems of Ovid; and wrote "The School for Fathers," a comedy; a volume of "Fugitive Poetry," &c.

ST. BEUVE, JACQUES DE, a celebrated theologian, born at Paris, in 1612. He was famous for his controversies relative to the doctrines of grace and predestination, which agitated the French church in the middle of the 17th century. Died, 1677.

ST. CROIX, GUILLAUME EMANUEL JOSEPH, baron DE, a learned French writer, was born at Mornotiron, in 1748; studied at the Jesuit's college, Grenoble; obtained the rank of captain in the grenadiers, but quitted the army for literary pursuits; suffered greatly during the Revolution; and died in 1809. His principal works are, a "History of the Naval Power of England," 2 vols.; and a "Critical Examination of the Historians of Alexander the Great."

ST. FOIX, GERMAIN FRANÇOIS POURLAIN DE, a French dramatist and miscellaneous writer, was born at Rennes, in Brittany, in 1703; became a captain in the army, and distinguished himself by his valour on many occasions. He afterwards devoted himself to literature, and published four volumes of "Comedies;" "Turkish Letters written in the manner of Montesquieu;" "Historical Essays upon Paris," 7 vols., &c. Died, 1776.

ST. GERMAIN, CLAUDE LOUIS, count DE, a French soldier and statesman, was born in 1707, in Franche Compté; served with distinction in the army for many years; but having quarrelled with the duke de Broglie, he quitted it for the service of Denmark, where he was made a field-marshal. He subsequently accepted the situation of war-minister to Louis XVI., which he held two years; and died in 1776.

ST. JUST, ANTHONY, a political agent and associate of Robespierre, was born in 1759, and was educated for the legal profession. He voted for the death of Louis XVI.; materially assisted in the destruction of the Girondists; acted as a commissioner of the National Convention, to the army in Alsace, where he was distinguished for his severity; and, on his return to Paris, becoming involved in the ruin of Robespierre, was guillotined, in July, 1794. This demagogue, who was the author of several works, among which were some licentious poems, has often been confounded with Louis LEON ST. JUST, the writer of "Esprit de la Revolution, et de la Constitution de France."

DRUM TRIPPLING PURSUITS, AND LET THE BEST ENERGIES OF THE MIND EVER HAVE SOME IMPORTANT OBJECT IN VIEW.

ST. LAMBERT, CHARLES FRANCES DE, a member of the French Academy, and afterwards of the National Institute, was born at Nancy, in 1717. He entered the army, which he left at the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, and obtained an office in the court of Stanislaus of Poland; became a devoted adherent of Voltaire's, and a favoured admirer of Madame de Chatelet; again entered the army; and died in 1805. Among his works are, "The Seasons," a poem; "Oriental Tales;" and a philosophical work, in 3 vols., entitled "Catechisme Universelle." He also contributed to the "Encyclopédie."

ST. MARC, CHARLES HUGH LEFEBVRE DE, a French author, born at Paris, in 1698. His most important work is "A Chronological Abridgment of the History of Italy, from the Downfall of the Western Empire," 6 vols. 8vo.

ST. MARC, JEAN PAUL ANDRE DES RAISINS, marquis DE, a French lyric poet, author of "Adieu de Pontleu," &c. Born, 1729; died, 1818.

ST. PALAYE, JEAN BAPTISTE DE LA CUNNE DE, a learned and ingenious French writer, born at Auxerre, in 1697; died, 1781. He studied the manners and customs of ancient France with great diligence and success; and wrote "Memoires sur l'ancienne Chevalerie," 3 vols., which have been translated into English. After his death, the abbé Millot published another work of his, entitled "L'Histoire des Troubadours," 3 vols.; and he left a voluminous collection of MSS.

ST. PIERRE, EUSTACHE DE, a citizen of Calais, who signalized himself when that place was besieged by Edward III. king of England, in 1347.

ST. PIERRE, CHARLES IRVING CASTEL DE, a French publicist and miscellaneous writer, was born at St. Pierre, in Normandy, in 1684. He was brought up as an ecclesiastic; but was more distinguished as a politician and philanthropist. Cardinal Polignac took him to the conferences at Utrecht, where he formed a project for a diet to secure a perpetual peace; which cardinal Dubois called "the dream of a good man." He had the boldness to expose the errors of the government of Louis XIV., and to deny that monarch's right to the epithet of "Great," for which he was expelled the academy. His works form 18 vols. 12mo. Died, 1744.

ST. PRIEST, FRANCIS EMANUEL GUYONARD, count de, a French statesman, born at Grenoble, in 1734. He first served in the army, and was afterwards engaged in diplomatic missions to Portugal, Constantinople, and the Hague; at which last place he was residing when the Revolution commenced. In 1790 he succeeded baron de Breteuil as minister of the royal household; but subsequent events drove him from France, and he remained in exile till after the restoration of the Bourbons. He was raised to the peerage in 1815; and died in 1821.

ST. REAL, CÉSAR VICHARD DE, an able French author, was born at Chamberri, in Savoy, where he died in 1692. He wrote "De l'Usage de l'Histoire;" "Conjuration des Espagnols contre la Republique de Venise en 1618;" and several other treatises on morals, politics, and philosophy.

ST. SIMON, LOUIS DE ROUVROI, duke of, was born in 1678. In 1721 he was appointed ambassador extraordinary to the court of Spain, to negotiate a marriage between the Infanta and Louis XV.; and died in 1757. His "Memoirs of the Reign of Louis XIV. and the Regency," containing a vast mass of anecdotal information, form 13 vols.

ST. SIMON, CLAUDIUS HENRY, count de, was born at Paris, in 1780. He was the founder of a politico-philosophical sect, whose leading dogma is, that industry is the definitive purpose of human society, and that those engaged in it constitute the superior class of society. He published a variety of works to give currency to his doctrines; among which are, an "Introduction to the Scientific Labours of the Nineteenth Century;" and "Political, Moral, and Philosophical Discussions." Died, 1825.

SALADIN, a famous sultan of Egypt, equally renowned as a warrior and legislator. He was born in 1137; raised himself from the station of an officer to that of a sovereign, and supported himself by his valour, and the influence of his amiable character, against the united efforts of the chief Christian potentates of Europe, who carried on the most unjust wars against him, under the false appellation of crusades. He obtained various successes over the Christians, but was defeated by Richard Cœur de Lion; and died in 1193.

SALARIO, ANDREW, a painter of Milan, and a disciple of Leonardo da Vinci. His pictures are valuable. He died at Florence in 1459.

SALE, GEORGE, an English writer, who was well versed in the oriental languages. His greatest work is an excellent translation of the Koran, to which he prefixed a curious Dissertation. Mr. Sale was also one of the principal authors of the "Ancient Universal History." Born, 1690; died, 1736.

SALICETI, CHRISTOPHER, a Corsican by birth, and a member of the French National Convention, who voted for the death of Louis XVI., and advocated the other violent measures of his brother revolutionists. When Buonaparte became first consul, he was at first proscribed, but afterwards restored to favour, and sent ambassador to Genoa. He was minister of police at Naples, when that country was under the rule of Joseph Buonaparte; and died in 1809.

SALISBURY, JOHN OF, a learned Augustine monk of the 12th century; author of "Polycraticon" &c. He was a friend of Thomas à Becket's, and is said to have been a witness to that prelate's murder. After that event he retired to France, and was made bishop of Chartres by the pope. Died, 1182.

SALISBURY, WILLIAM, a Welsh lawyer in the reign of Elizabeth, celebrated as the first translator of the Liturgy of the Church of England, into the Welsh Language. He died in 1570.

SALLO, DENIS DE, a French writer, born at Paris, in 1626. He was a counsellor of the parliament in that city, and is distinguished as the original conductor of the first literary journal established in Europe; the "Journal des Savans" being commenced by him in 1665. He died in 1669.

SALLUST, CAIUS CRISPUS, a Roman historian, distinguished equally for his talents and profligacy, was born at Amiternum, B.C. 85. He was expunged from the list of senators, in consequence of his extravagance, and shameless debaucheries; but being restored by Julius Caesar, and made governor of Numidia, he there amassed an enormous fortune by acts of rapine. He died B.C. 35. His "History of the Jugurthine War," and "The Conspiracy of Catiline," bear ample testimony to his genius; but the rigid morality displayed in his writings, form a curious contrast to the vices of the author.

SALMASIUS, or SAUMAISE, CLAUDE, an eminent French scholar, was born at Saumur, in 1588, and succeeded Scaliger as professor of history, at Leyden. In 1649 he wrote an able defence of Charles I. king of England, which was forcibly and virulently replied to by Milton. The year following, he went to Sweden on an invitation from queen Christina; and died in 1653. His principal works are, "Historiæ Augustæ Scriptores;" "De Modo Usurarium;" "De Re Militari Romanorum;" "De Hellenistica," and several editions of ancient authors, as Florus, Polistor, Simplicius on Epictetus, &c.

SALMON WILLIAM, an empirical physician, and a voluminous compiler of books, among which are "The Complete Physician," "The Universal Herbal," a "Treatise on Astrology," "Polygraphice, or the Art of Painting," &c. He died about 1700.

SALMON, NATHANIEL, brother of the preceding, an English divine, biographer, and antiquary. Died 1740. He wrote the History and Antiquities of several of the English Counties; and is esteemed for the accuracy of his deductions, and patient research.

SALMON, THOMAS, an industrious writer and compiler, whose productions include "An Examination of Burnet's History of his own Times;" "The Chronological Historian;" a "History of England," 12 vols.; "Modern History," 3 vols. folio; a "Universal Gazetteer," &c. Died, 1743.

SALVIATI, FRANCESCO ROSSI, an eminent Italian painter, who in his style of designing came very near to Raphael, though he was by no means equal to him in sublimity and grandeur of composition. He was born in Florence, in 1510, and died in 1563.

SAMPSON, Dr. HENRY, an English divine, and physician, was born at South Leverton, in Nottinghamshire; studied physic at Padua and Leyden; and on his return to England, was chosen a member of the college of physicians. Died, 1705.

SAMWELL, DAVID, a native of Nant-glyn, in Denbighshire. He was surgeon of the ship Discovery, with Captain Cook, and was an eye-witness of the death of that celebrated navigator; of which event he wrote a circumstantial account. He was also the author of some Welsh poems. Died, 1799.

SANADON, NOEL STEPHEN, a learned French jesuit, was born at Rouen, in 1674, and died in 1733. His principal works are "Latin Poems," 2 vols.; and a translation of Horace, with valuable notes, 2 vols.

SAN CARLOS, JOSEPH MICHAEL DE CARYAJAL, duke of, a Spanish statesman, was born in Lima, in 1771; went to Spain at the age of sixteen; began his military career as colonel in the second regiment of Majorca infantry, of which his uncle was colonel-proprietor; and was in the campaign of Catalonia, in the war of 1793, and a volunteer in the Toulon expedition. On the death of his uncle, he was appointed chamberlain, and subsequently governor, to the prince of Asturias, afterwards Ferdinand VII. In 1805 he was invested with the office of major-domo to Charles IV., and, in 1807, was appointed viceroy of Navarre. Three months after he had taken his viceroyalty, he received orders to consider himself a prisoner in the citadel; and though liberated at the same time as prince Ferdinand, he was ordered to remove sixty leagues from Madrid, and was prohibited from fixing his residence in Navarre. He resided at Alfaro when the French armies entered Spain. In the mean time the insurrection in Aranjuez broke out, and Ferdinand being placed on the throne, he immediately appointed the duke grand-master of the household and a member of his privy council; nor did the subsequent arrangements which Ferdinand was compelled to yield to, detach San Carlos from his service, till, by the order of Napoleon, he was called, with Escóquiz, to Paris. Suspicions being at length entertained of the duke and Escóquiz's influence over Ferdinand, they were separated from that prince; the duke being confined at Louis-le-Saulnier, and Escóquiz at Bourges. When, however, it was determined by Napoleon to reinstate Ferdinand on the throne, he fixed upon the duke of San Carlos, as best suited, by his counsels and knowledge of all parties in Spain, to conciliate their regards. He was therefore called to Paris in November, 1813, and afterwards went to Valençay, where long discussions ensued, which ended in the duke's setting out for Madrid, to obtain the consent of the regency to the treaty. The cortes, however, refusing to give up the reins of government, San Carlos proceeded with Ferdinand to Valencia; was appointed first secretary of state; and the next day he signed the infamous decree by which a despotism was established. General Freyer, who had been nominated to the ministry of war, declined the place, and the duke accepted it, in conjunction with that of minister of the king's household; but the former office he shortly after resigned to general Aguirre. The duke set about introducing a system of economy into the kingdom; established a junta of ministers, over whom he presided; took measures for repairing the roads and forming canals; revived the credit of the national bank; and instituted several academies for the cultivation of the arts and sciences. Notwithstanding these benefits, his enemies were numerous; and, finding them increase, he requested permission to resign, which the king granted (Nov. 1814).

and Don Pedro Cevallos was appointed to succeed him. He was nominated minister to Vienna, in October, 1816; and in 1817 he was recalled, and sent to the court of Great Britain in the same capacity. In consequence of the troubles in Spain (1823-28), the duke retired to the court of Lucca, by which he was sent ambassador to Charles X., in 1825. He was subsequently named ambassador-extraordinary to the same court, and continued in that station till his death, in July, 1828.

SANCHO, IGONATIUS, a negro, whose literary abilities attracted much notice, was born in 1729, on board a slave-ship, and carried to Carthage. While a boy he was brought to England by his master, and given to three maiden ladies, sisters, living at Greenwich, who named him Sancho. The duke of Montague afterwards took him into his service, and encouraged his love of learning; and the duchess left him an annuity at her death. He numbered among his friends, Sterne, Garrick, and other literary characters; and was the author of "Letters," "Poems," &c. Died, 1780.

SANCROFT, WILLIAM, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Fressingfield, in Suffolk, in 1616. In 1664 he was made dean of York; then dean of St. Paul's; and in 1677 he was raised to the highest station in the church, where he conducted himself with zeal and judgment. He was one of the seven bishops sent to the Tower by James II.; but at the Revolution he refused to take the oaths, for which he was deprived of his see. Died, 1693. He wrote "The Predestinated Thief;" "Modern Politics, taken from Machiavel," &c.

SANCTORIUS, an eminent physician, was born at Capo d'Istria, in 1561; filled the professor's chair in the university of Padua; was the first physician that endeavoured to ascertain the heat of the skin by a thermometer; and rendered his name memorable by his work, entitled "Ars de Statica Medicina." Died, 1636.

SANDBY, PAUL, an eminent artist, born at Nottingham, in 1733. He took numerous views in Wales and Scotland, which he transferred to copper-plates, in imitation of drawings in India ink; a method of aquatint engraving which he carried to great perfection. On the institution of the Royal Academy he was elected a member; and in 1763 he was appointed chief drawing-master at Woolwich. Died, 1809.

SANDEMAN, ROBERT, a Scotch minister, was born at Perth, in 1723, and educated at St. Andrew's. He formed a sect which still goes by his name. In 1766 he went to New England; made many proselytes; and died in 1772. The sect's opinions and practices in which the sect differs from others, are their weekly administration of the Lord's Supper, washing each other's feet, &c.

SANDERS, NICHOLAS, a zealous Roman catholic writer, was born at Charlewold, in Surrey. About 1606 he went to Rome, and was sent by pope Gregory XIII. as nuncio to Ireland, where, to avoid falling into the hands of the English, he wandered about in the woods and bogs, and perished of want in 1681. His principal work is his treatise against the Reformation, entitled

"De Origine ac Progressu Schismatis Anglicani."

SANDERSON, Dr. ROBERT, bishop of Lincoln, an eminent polemical writer, and casuist. Born, 1587; died, 1663.

SANDERSON, ROBERT, a learned antiquary, was usher of the court of chancery, and clerk of the rolls. He continued "Rymer's Fœdera," from the 16th to the 20th volume; and died in 1741.

SANDYS, EDWIN, an eminent English prelate, was born in 1519, at Hawkshead, in Lancashire. At the accession of Mary he was vice-chancellor, and on refusing to proclaim her, he was deprived of his office, and sent first to the Tower, and afterwards to the Marshalsea. When Elizabeth came to the throne he was appointed one of the commissioners for revising the Liturgy. He was also made bishop of Worcester, and had a share in the translation of the Scriptures, commonly called the "Bishop's Bible." In 1570 he was translated to London, and in 1576 to York, where a conspiracy was laid by Sir Robert Stapleton, to ruin him by the imputation of adultery; but it was discovered, and the parties concerned in it were punished. He died in 1588.

SANDYS, Sir EDWIN, second son of the preceding, was born about 1561, and educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, under the learned Hooker. He then went on his travels; and published the result of his observations under the title of "Europæ Speculum." He was knighted by James I., who employed him in many important missions; and he died in 1629.

SANDYS, GEORGE, second son of the archbishop of that name, was born in 1577, at Bishop's Thorpe, and was educated at St. Mary Hall, Oxford. He travelled through the Levant and Italy, of which, in 1615, he published an account. Among his other works are, a translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses, and paraphrases of various parts of Scripture. He died in 1643.

SANGALLO, ANTONIO, an eminent Italian architect of the 16th century, was born at Florence; and on visiting Rome, where he had two uncles who were architects, he was instructed by them, and subsequently perfected himself in the art under Bramante, whom he succeeded as architect of the church of St. Peter. He was much employed under the popes Leo X., Clement VII., and Paul III., both in fortifying places, and in the construction of public buildings, the grandeur and solidity of which have been much admired. Died, 1546.

SANMICHELI, MICHAEL, a celebrated Italian architect, born at Verona, in 1484. He erected several cathedrals, and other magnificent edifices; and particularly excelled in the construction of fortified works. Died, 1549.

SANNAZARIUS, or SANNAZARO, JACORO, a distinguished Italian poet, who wrote both in Latin and Italian, was born in 1458, at Naples; where he died, in 1522. He was the author of sonnets, canzoni, elegies, eclogues, epigrams, and a poem, entitled "De Partu Virginis." His elegance of expression, no less than the poetical beauty of his thoughts, gave him a distinguished place among the modern Latin poets.

SANSEVERO, RAYMOND DI SANGRO, eminent for his mechanical inventions and scientific discoveries, was born at Naples, in 1710; and died in 1771. Among the multifarious and extraordinary machines invented by him, was a four-wheeled vehicle, to pass over the surface of the water, which he exhibited on the bay of Naples.

SANSON, NICHOLAS, a celebrated French geographer and engineer, was born at Abbeville, in 1600; and constructed, even while a youth, a map of ancient Gaul, remarkable for its excellence and accuracy. He subsequently produced upwards of three hundred maps, all on a large scale, with several volumes to illustrate them; reached the head of his profession; and was appointed geographer and engineer to the king. Died, 1667.—His three sons, NICHOLAS, WILLIAM, and ADRIAN, who also were excellent geographers, collected and published the works of their father, as well as several of their own.

SANSOVINO, GIACOMO FATTI, an eminent sculptor and architect, was born at Florence, in 1479. He ornamented Rome and Venice with many splendid structures; and enjoyed so great a reputation, that when a general impost was levied at Venice, he and Titian were the only persons exempted from the tax. Died, 1570.

SANTA CRUZ DE MARZENADO, Don ALVAR DE NAVIA OSORIO, marquis of, an able Spanish officer and diplomatist, who distinguished himself in the war of the succession, was born in 1667; and was killed, in 1732, in a sally from Oran, of which city he was governor. He wrote "Military Reflections," 11 vols. 4to.

SANTERRE, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French painter, was born at Magny, near Pontoise, in 1661. He painted historical subjects, on a small size, and with great delicacy. Died, 1717.

SANTERRE, M., commandant of the national guard of Paris, and general in the republican army, was a rich brazier, who, having acquired some influence with the citizens, availed himself of the circumstance, to act a part in the French revolution. He rendered himself notorious at the demolition of the Bastille, on the memorable 14th of July, 1789; but, deficient of the talents which are most necessary to form the leader of a party, he was satisfied to follow the inspirations which were excited by his more fortunate competitors for public favour. Appointed to command a battalion of the Parisian guard, he figured on the 30th of June, 1791, as the agent to intimidate the minority in the legislative assembly, and assist in delivering up Louis XVI. and his unhappy family to the violence of an infuriated mob. He presided at the sad catastrophe, on the 21st January, 1793; and, by ordering the drums to beat when his majesty addressed his people, prevented the voice of the victim from being heard. On the 10th of June following, he headed 14,000 men against the royalist army; but, as he possessed mere courage, without any military talent, his campaign was a failure. He lost his councillor in the death of Danton; and the committee of public safety suspecting his fidelity, he was arrested in April, 1794. After obtaining his liberty, which he was lucky enough to effect in a short time, Santerre sunk into deserved obscurity.

SANTEUL, or SANTOLIUS, JOHN DE, a distinguished modern Latin poet, was born at Paris, in 1630; and after studying under the Jesuits, entered among the canons of the abbey of St. Victor; and died in 1697. He was eccentric, witty, and capricious; generally licentious, but at times endeavouring to atone for it by sudden fits of devotion.

SAPPHO, a celebrated Greek poetess, born at Mitylene, in the island of Lesbos, about B.C. 600. Her writings were highly esteemed by the ancients, and she is regarded as the inventress of the metre which bears her name; but, of her works, there at present exist only a "Hymn to Venus," an ode, and a few trifling fragments.—Another SAPPHO, of a later date, who is usually confounded with the foregoing, from being also a native of Lesbos, was no less distinguished for amorous propensities than for the warmth of her lyrical effusions; and is said to have thrown herself into the sea, from the promontory of Leucate, in consequence of the neglect she experienced from Phaoon, her lover.

SARAZIN, JACQUES, a French sculptor, was born at Noyon, in 1584. After learning the rudiments of his art at Paris, he went to Rome, where he studied painting as well as sculpture; and, on his return, he was much employed at the palace of Versailles. Died, 1664.

SARAZIN, JOHN, a French marshal, was born in 1770. In 1793, he was secretary to general Marceau; and, in 1796, he was employed in the expedition to Ireland. He served in the German campaigns under Buonaparte, during 1803 and 1804; but, in 1809, deserted from the camp at Boulogne, and came to England in a fishing-boat. He treated with the English ministry for employment, but disagreed about terms; then followed the English invading army into Spain, and re-appeared in France after the restoration of the Bourbons, to whom he avowed an ardent attachment. He was accused of trigamy in 1819; but justified himself in person, without denying the charge; and was condemned to the galleys for ten years. The punishment, however, was not carried into effect, and the general sheltered himself in the obscurity of private life during the remainder of his days.

SARBIEWSKI, MATTHIAS CASIMIR, a Polish poet, usually known by the name of Casimir, was born in 1696; became a professor in the Jesuits' college at Wilna; wrote some elegant Latin poems; and died in 1640.

SARRASIN, JOHN FRANCIS, an eminent French poet, born in Normandy, in 1694. He was secretary to the prince of Conti; wrote a "History of the Siege of Dan-kirk;" poems, and various other works; and died in 1664.

SARTI, JOSEPH, a graceful musical composer, born at Faenza, in 1730; who, after having been master of the conservatorio of La Pieta, at Venice, was invited to St. Petersburg by the empress Catharine, who appointed him director of music at the conservatory of Catharineslaß, with a magnificent salary, to which she afterwards added a title of nobility and an estate. Died, 1802.

HE IS HAPPY WHO IS CHERISHED, THOUGH FORTHWITH LITTLE; HE UNHAPPY WHO IS TROUBLED, AMIDST GREAT WEALTH.

SAUMAREZ, Right Hon. JAMES, lord DE, a distinguished officer in the British navy, was born in the island of Guernsey, in 1757, and was descended from a French family, whose ancestor accompanied William the Conqueror to this country. He entered the naval service at the age of sixteen; accompanied Sir Peter Parker across the Atlantic, and having signalized himself in an attack upon Fort Sullivan, received the command of the Spitfire; but the cutter having been much damaged, was burnt, to avoid falling into the hands of the enemy, and he returned a passenger to England. After being actively engaged, under Sir Hyde Parker, at Dogger's-bank, and with admirals Hood and Rodney, he was sent to cruise on the French coast, where he captured La Reclusion, a fine French frigate, without the loss of a single man, while 150 were killed or wounded on the part of the enemy; which gallant action procured him the honour of Knighthood. He afterwards sailed with Sir John Jervis in the Mediterranean, and shared in the victory off Cape St. Vincent in 1797; and going again to the Mediterranean, was second in command to lord Nelson, in the glorious victory of the Nile. On his return to England, Sir James received the decoration of the order of the Bath, and was appointed colonel of marines; and in 1801 he was made a rear-admiral of the blue, created a baron, and appointed to the command of the squadron off Cadiz. On the 6th of July he made a daring attack on a superior force in the bay of Algeiras; but owing to the protection of the batteries, and the wind failing, he was compelled to withdraw his ships after an action of five hours, and repair to Gibraltar to refit. With unparalleled expedition he again put to sea, and offered battle to the enemy's fleet, now amounting to ten sail of the line, his own squadron consisting of only half the number; which ended in two of the enemy's three-deckers being blown up, and a 74-gun ship captured; and though the darkness of night gave the remainder an opportunity of escaping, they were so crippled that they were laid up at Cadiz, and never again during the war left that port. For this brave action Sir James received the order of the Bath, together with the thanks of both houses of parliament, and a pension of 1500*l.* per annum. After this he performed a series of signal services to his country, as commander-in-chief of the British fleet in the Baltic; and when this country was visited by the emperor of Russia and the king of Prussia, he received the personal thanks of those monarchs, together with those of prince Metternich, on the part of the emperor of Austria, for the services he had rendered to the common cause of Europe. In 1831 he was appointed vice-admiral of England, which appointment he resigned for that of general of marines; and at the coronation of William IV. he was called to the House of Peers, as Baron de Saumarez. He died at Saumarez, his seat in the island of Guernsey, in October, 1836. In private life his lordship was affable, courteous, pious, and charitable.

SAUNDERS, Sir EDMUND, an English judge in the reign of Charles II., who was originally an errand-boy at the luns of court. A lawyer of St. Clement's Inn perceiving his genius, took him into his office, and made him his clerk. He afterwards became an eminent counsel, and rose to be chief justice in the court of King's Bench. Died, 1683.

SAUNDERS, JOHN CUNNINGHAM, a surgeon and oculist, was born in 1773, in Devonshire, and became demonstrator of anatomy at St. Thomas's hospital, London. He was particularly skillful in the treatment of disorders of the eye, for which he instituted an infirmary in 1804. He wrote "On the Anatomy and Diseases of the Ear," and "On the Diseases of the Eye." Died, 1810.

SAUNDERS, WILLIAM, an eminent physician and medical writer, was born in 1743; became senior physician to Guy's hospital; and died in 1819. Among his works are, treatises on the "Structure, Economy, and Diseases of the Liver," on "Indian Hepatitis," on "Mineral Waters," &c.

SAUNDERSON, NICHOLAS, an eminent mathematician, was born in 1682, at Thirston, in Yorkshire. He lost his sight when twelve months old, by the small-pox; but was sent to the free school at Penkington, where he made a great proficiency in classical learning. At the age of eighteen he was introduced to Mr. West, a gentleman of fortune, and a lover of the mathematics, who instructed him in algebra and geometry; and he made such progress, that his friends sent him to Cambridge, where he delivered lectures on the mathematics to crowded audiences. Having been created M.A. by royal mandate, he was appointed Lucasian professor of mathematics in 1711; and in 1728 he received the degree of LL.D. Died, 1739.

SAURIN, JAMES, an eminent French Protestant preacher, was born at Nismes, in 1677. Upon the revocation of the edict of Nantes, in 1685, his father retired with his family to Geneva, where the subject of this article made a considerable progress in learning, but quitted his studies, and went into the army. When the duke of Savoy, under whom he served, made peace in 1696, he returned to Geneva, with a view to engage in the ministry. In 1700, he visited England, where he preached nearly five years to his fellow refugees in London. He subsequently became pastor to a congregation of French refugees, who assembled in a chapel belonging to the prince of Orange, at the Hague. He was the author of twelve volumes of "Sermons;" "The State of Christianity in France;" "Discourses, Historical, Critical, and Moral, on the most remarkable Events of the Old and New Testaments," &c. Died, 1730.

SAURIN, JOSEPH, brother of the preceding, was born in 1669, and distinguished himself as a mathematician. He was originally a protestant minister; but, in 1690, he embraced the catholic faith, and was pensioned by Louis XIV. He contributed for some years to the Journal des Savans; and died in 1730.

HE WHO HAS THE SUPPLENESS OF THE DEMAGOGUE, WILL LIVE TO COMPLAIN OF THE VICLENES OF THE MOR.

SAURIN, BERNARD JOSEPH, son of the last mentioned, was born in 1706, at Paris; and quitted the bar to become a dramatic writer. He was the author of "Spartacus," a tragedy; "Mœurs des Temps," a spirited comedy; and a variety of other dramas. Died, 1781.

SAUSSURE, HORACE BENEDICT DE, a celebrated naturalist, was born at Geneva, in 1740; attained an early proficiency in the mathematical and physical sciences; and was for several years professor of philosophy at Geneva. He travelled in France, England, Italy, &c.; and by the valuable observations, which he made, particularly among the glaciers of the Alps, he contributed much to the advancement of geology and meteorology. He also showed great ingenuity in the construction of improved instruments adapted to scientific uses; viz. a thermometer, a hygrometer, a eudiometer, an electrometer, &c. Died, 1799.

SAUVAGES, FRANCIS BOISSIER DE, a celebrated French botanist and physician, born in 1708, at Alais; became professor of medicine and botany at the university of Montpellier; was a member of nearly all the learned societies in Europe; and acquired by his writings and lectures, as well as by his zeal, a high reputation. His principal work is entitled "Nosologia Methodica," 5 vols. Died, 1767.

SAUVEUR, JOSEPH, a French mathematician, born in 1653, at La Flèche. He was dumb till he had passed his seventh year; but such was his love for the mathematical sciences, that he acquired them with scarcely any instruction, and became professor at the royal college. He was the discoverer of that branch of science called musical acoustics; and died in 1716.

SAVAGE, RICHARD, an English poet, celebrated for his genius, irregularities, and misfortunes, was born in London, about 1698. The singularity of Savage, adorned as it is by the pen of his intimate friend, Dr. Johnson, has acquired great interest, but there is reason to believe that much of it is utterly fictitious. Savage was probably the son of a woman who had been employed to nurse a natural son of the countess of Macclesfield by earl Rivers. That lady always asserted that her child died while quite young, and that Savage was an impostor. Johnson's account, taken from Savage himself, is, that no sooner did he see the light, than a most unnatural hatred took complete possession of his mother; who placed him with an old woman in the lowest state of indigence, with directions that he should be brought up in utter ignorance of his birth, and in the meanest condition. He was an apprentice to a shoemaker, when this woman dying suddenly, some of Lady Mason's letters, which he found among her papers, discovered to him, as he asserts, the secret of his birth; but it is more probable, that they suggested to him the plan of assuming to be the child of lady Macclesfield, whom his mother had nursed, and to whom these letters really related. From this moment his attempts to obtain the notice of her ladyship were incessant, but all his assiduities and applications were unavailing. He now became an author, and, in 1723, produced the tragedy of "Sir Thomas Overbury," the profits of which produced him 200*l.*; and he was rising in reputation, when, in 1727, he accidentally killed a Mr. Sinclair, at a house of ill-fame, in a drunken quarrel. For this he was tried, and found guilty; but obtained the royal pardon, through the intercession of lady Hertford. Soon after, lord Tyrconnel became his patron, received him into his house, and allowed him 200*l.* a-year; but the bard and the peer quarrelled, and he was again turned adrift upon the world. A birth-day Ode, addressed to the queen, procured him a pension of 50*l.*, but on her majesty's death this was discontinued, and he subsequently endured much misery and privation; till at length, in 1743, he died in the debtor's prison, at Newgate; exhibiting, as his biographer, Johnson, observes, a lamentable proof that "negligence and irregularity, long continued, will make knowledge useless, wit ridiculous, and genius contemptible."

SAVARY, NICHOLAS, a French traveller and author, was a native of Vitre, in Brittany; travelled to Egypt and the Levant, where he gathered much information relative to the antiquities, manners, and customs of the country; and died in 1783. He translated the Koran, wrote a "Life of Mahomet," "Letters on Egypt," &c.

SAVEREIN, ALEXANDER, a French mathematician, was born at Arles, in 1720; and died in 1803. His principal works relate to naval tactics and maritime affairs; but he also wrote on philosophical and other subjects.

SAVILLE, Sir HENRY, one of the most profound and elegant scholars of his age, was born in 1549, and after graduating at Brazen-nose college, Oxford, removed on a fellowship to Merton college, in the same university. In his twenty-ninth year, he made a tour on the continent for the purpose of perfecting himself in elegant literature, and on his return was appointed tutor in Greek and mathematics to queen Elizabeth. Seven years after, the wardenship of his college was conferred on him, which he held for about six-and-thirty years, the provostship of Eton being added to it in 1596. Among his works are "Commentaries on Roman Warfare," and other learned treatises. Died, 1622.

SAVONAROLA, JEROME, a Dominican, was born at Ferrara, in 1453. He was regarded by some as an enthusiast, and by others as an impostor; but he preached with great zeal against the corruptions of the Roman church, for which he was condemned to the flames in 1498. He wrote Sermons; a treatise entitled "The Triumph of the Cross," and other works.

SAXE, MAURICE, count DE, marshal-general of the French armies, was born at Dresden, in 1696. He was the natural son of Frederic Augustus II. king of Poland, by the countess of Konigsmark, and died in 1750, leaving behind him the character of one of the greatest and most successful generals of the age. His "Reveries, or Memoirs concerning the Art of War," together with other small pieces, were translated into English, and published at London, in 1757.

SAXE-WEIMAR, BERNARD, duke of, an illustrious general of the 17th century, who from the year 1623 to 1630, was continually engaged in the wars of Germany, and was looked up to as one of the most valuable champions of the Protestant cause.

SAXO, GRAMMATICUS, a Danish historian who flourished in the 13th century.

SAY, JEAN BAPTISTE, an eminent French writer on political economy, born in 1767. He concerted with Chamfort (who was guillotined) the "Decade Philosophique," during the revolution. Buonaparte, on going to Egypt, made him his librarian extraordinary, and afterwards appointed him a member of the tribunal, from which post he was dismissed by his patron, for having the consistent honesty to vote against the creation of an emperor and empire. His "Traite d'Economie Publique" is a most valuable work, and has been compared to Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations. Among his other works are, "Observations sur l'Angleterre et les Anglais;" "Cours complet d'Economie Politique," 6 vols., &c. In his private life, M. Say is said to have exhibited a model of the domestic virtues; and, as a political character, though assailed by trials and temptations throughout the stormy periods of the French revolution, as well as during the despotism of Napoleon, he maintained an unshaken reputation. He died in 1833.

SCALA, BARTHELEMI, an Italian statesman and historian; born, 1430; died, 1497. His chief work is a "History of the Florentine Republic."

SCALIGER, JULIUS CESAR, generally known as the elder Scaliger, a celebrated scholar, was born in 1484, at the castle of Riva, on lake Garda, and became a page of the emperor Maximilian, whom he served in war and peace for seventeen years. When he was about forty, he quitted the army, and applied himself to the study of natural law, medicine, and the learned languages. In 1525, he accompanied the bishop of Agen to his diocese in France, where he died in 1558. His work "De Arte Poetica," gained him much reputation, and few men have surpassed him in erudition; but his vanity and insolence were on a par with his talents.

SCALIGER, JOSEPH JUSTUS, son of the preceding, was born at Agen, in 1540; was made professor of polite literature at Leyden, and is said to have been master of no less than thirteen languages, in the acquirement of which he possessed extraordinary facility. Died, 1609.

SCANDERBEG, (which means the BRY ALEXANDER) whose proper name was George Castriotto, was the son of John, prince of Albania, and was born in 1404. Being given by his father as a hostage to sultan Amurath II., he was educated in the Mohammedan religion, and at the age of eighteen, was paged at the head of a body troops, with the title of sangiac. After the death of his father in 1432, he formed the design of possessing himself of his principality; and having accompanied the Turkish army to Hungary, he entered into an agreement with Hanniades to desert to the Christians. This design he put into execution; and, having ascended the throne of his fathers, he renounced the Mohammedan religion. A long warfare followed; but although frequently obliged to retire to the fastnesses of mountains, he always renewed his assaults upon the first favourable occasion, until the sultan proposed terms of peace to him, which were accepted. He however, renounced his treaty with the sultan; obtained repeated victories over the Turkish armies; completely established his power; and died in 1467. His personal prowess was doubtless prodigious, but the accounts which are related of it exceed all credibility. His death was a great loss to Christendom; and when the Turkish emperor heard of it, he exultingly exclaimed, "Who shall now prevent me from destroying the infidels, who have lost their sword and buckler!" The Albanians, after the death of their chief, appeared to have been deprived of all energy, and in no long time submitted again to the Musselman domination.

SCAPULA, JOHN, the author of a valuable lexicon of the Greek language, published originally in quarto, in 1563, which has since gone through a variety of editions.

SCARLATTI, ALESSANDRO, born at Naples, in 1659; was educated at Rome under Carissimi; and died in 1728. The Italians called him the "glory of the art," and the first of composers. He composed about a hundred operas, a great number of motets, and nearly two hundred masses.—DOMENICO SCARLATTI, his son, born in 1663, resided for a time at Rome and Naples, but finally settled at Madrid, where he obtained the appointment of chapel-master to the queen of Spain. He produced several operas and some good church music; and was on terms of friendship with Handel.

SCARPA, ANTONIO, a celebrated Italian anatomist, was born in 1746, at Friuli; and died at Pavia, in 1826. He enjoyed an extensive reputation throughout Europe, by his admirable description of the nerves in his "Tabula Neurologica." His treatises on the organs of hearing, sight, and smell, and on aneurism, hernia, and lithotomy, &c., further contributed to his surgical fame; while his exquisite taste for the fine arts, and his amiable disposition, rendered him a great favourite in a more extended sphere.

SCARRON, PAUL, a comic poet and satirist, was born at Paris, in 1610; and was intended for the church; to which he was averse, and for which his habits were decidedly unfit. At the age of twenty-four, he travelled into Italy, where he gave himself up without restraint, to indulgences of every kind, and continued his excesses after his return to Paris. At the age of twenty-seven, having appeared during the carnival at Mans as a savage, he was pursued by the populace, and being obliged to hide himself in a marsh, he lost the use of his limbs. Notwithstanding his sufferings, he never lost his gaiety; and, settling at Paris, his wit and social powers gained him a wide circle of acquaintance, among whom was the beautiful Mademoiselle d'Aubigné, who after his death was known as the widow Scarron, and who was eventually rendered still more famous as Madame de Maintenon. His principal writings are, his "Comic Romance," and his "Virgile Travestie." Died, 1660.

SCARSGILL, W. P.; author of "The Puritan's Grave," "The Usurer's Daughter," "Provincial Sketches," &c. Died, 1836.

SCHADOW, ZENO RIDOLFO, an Italian sculptor, was born at Rome, in 1766; and was instructed by Canova and Thorwaldsen. He executed many admired sculptures and bas reliefs; and died in 1822.

SCHAEFFER, JACOB CHRISTIAN, a distinguished German philosopher, was born in 1715, and died at Ratisbon in 1790.

SCHALKEN, GODFRAY, a Dutch painter of considerable merit, who chiefly excelled in painting candle-light scenes. Born, 1643; died, 1706.

SCHANK, JOHN, a naval officer, was born in 1740, at Caister, in Fleshire; entered the service early in life; and distinguished himself on the Canadian lakes during the American war as an able engineer. After the peace, he devoted himself chiefly to the improvement of shipping, and, among other contrivances, invented one for navigating vessels in shallow water, by means of sliding keels. He was actively employed in the defence of the British coast, and in the transport service, during the war with France; and rose to the rank of admiral of the blue in 1821. He was one of the first founders of the Society for promoting Naval Architecture, and wrote several valuable papers for the Institution. Died, 1823.

SCHÉELE, CHARLES WILLIAM, an eminent chemist, was born in 1745, at Stralsund, in Swedish Pomerania; was brought up as an apothecary at Strasburg; became proprietor of a pharmaceutical establishment at Kœping; and died in 1786. He wrote "Chemical Essays;" and was the discoverer of the oxalic, fluoric, malic, and lactic acids.

SCHELHORN, JOHN GEORGE, a celebrated German bibliographer, was born in 1694, at Memmingen; and there died in 1773.

SCHEMMELPENNINCK, ROTGER JOHN, a Dutch statesman, born in 1761; died in 1825. He was grand pensionary of Holland during its union with France, previous to Louis Buonaparte becoming king; which latter elevation he recommended to his countrymen, in preference to an incorporation with France.

SCHIAVONETTI, LOUIS, an eminent engraver, was born in 1765, at Bassano, in the state of Venice; and settled in England, where he acquired a high reputation, both as an artist and a man. Died, 1810.

SCHILL, FERDINAND VON, a distinguished Prussian officer, was born in 1773; and entered the army in 1789. He was severely wounded at the battle of Jena; but took the field again at the head of a free corps, in which he displayed great ability. Indignant at the subjection of his country to the influence of Buonaparte, he resolved to erect the standard of revolt, and make an effort for the liberation of Germany. With that view he collected a small body of troops, and commenced operations on the Elbe; but, after having obtained some successes, he was overpowered, and slain, at Stralsund, in May, 1809.

SCHILLER, JOHN FREDERIC CHRISTOPHER, an eminent German poet, was born at Warbach, in 1759. After having studied medicine, and become surgeon in a regiment, he, in his twenty-second year, published his tragedy of "The Robbers," which at once raised him to the foremost rank among the dramatists of his country. The tragedies of "Fiesco," and "Cabal and Love," were his next productions; these were succeeded by "Don Carlos," "Wallenstein," "Mary Stuart," "Joan of Arc," and "William Tell." But it was not only as a dramatist that he distinguished himself; he wrote a "History of the Remarkable Conspiracies and Revolutions in the Middle and Later Ages;" a "History of the Thirty Years' War;" "Philosophical Letters;" and a singular romance, entitled, "The Ghost-Seer." He died in 1805; having earned for himself a high name in the literary annals of Germany.

SCHIPANI, GUISEPPA, a patriotic general of the Neapolitan republic in 1799: defeated and executed by cardinal Ruffo and the counter-revolutionists, who restored the Neapolitan Bourbons.

SCHLEGEL, FREDERIC VON, a celebrated German critic and philologist, was born in 1772, and was a younger brother of Augustus William Schlegel, the author of "Lectures on Dramatic Literature." His first production of any importance was the "History of the Poetry of the Greeks and Romans." He then joined his brother in conducting a periodical called "The Athenæum;" and after publishing the philosophical romance of "Lucinda," he visited Paris, where he delivered lectures on philosophy, and occupied himself with the fine arts. In 1804 he published a "Collection of the Romantic Poetry of the Middle Ages." After this, he repaired to Vienna, and, in 1809, received an appointment at the headquarters of the archduke Charles, where he drew up several powerful proclamations. When peace was concluded, he again delivered lectures in Vienna, on modern history and the literature of all nations. In 1812, he published the "German Museum," and gained the confidence of prince Metternich by the composition of various diplomatic papers, in consequence of which he was appointed Austrian counsellor of legation at the Germanic diet, which he held during the remainder of his life. Died, 1829.

SCHLOETZER, AUGUSTUS LOUIS, a German historian, was born in 1737; became professor of philosophy and politics at Göttingen; and died in 1809. Among his works are, "A History of Lithuania;" and he was one of the conductors of the "Literary Gazette of Göttingen."

SCHMAUSS, JOHN JAMES, historian and publicist, was born at Landau, in 1680. He was educated at Halle, and commenced a life of literary labour at the age of twenty-one, from which he was relieved by the margrave of Baden-Dourlach, who gave him official employment at his court. In 1731 he was appointed by George II. professor of history at the university of Göttingen; where he died in 1747. During the twenty-six years that he presided at Göttingen, it was regarded as a school of diplomacy for the youth of the greatest families in Europe. Among his principal works are, "A Sketch of the History of the Empire;" "Corpus Juris publici Academicum;" "Corpus Juris gentium Academicum," and an "Introduction to the Science of Politics."

SCHOEPPFLIN, JOHN DANIEL, a learned German historian, was born in 1694; and became professor of history and rhetoric at Strasburg; where he died in 1771. He published several works of great research, and was for more than half a century one of the most distinguished ornaments of the university of Strasburg. His valuable library and museum he left to the public.

SCHOEFFER, PETER, one of the inventors of printing, was born at Gernsheim, in the territory of Darmstadt; was a partner with Gutenberg and Faust; and having married the daughter of the latter, became sole possessor of the printing establishment. He died about 1502.

SCHOMBERG, HENRY DE, marshal of France, was descended of a German family. He served in 1617 in Piedmont under marshal d'Estrees, and afterwards against the Huguenots in the civil wars. In 1625 he was made field-marshal, and two years afterwards defeated the English at the Isle of Rhé. In 1629 he forced the passage of Susa, on which occasion he was severely wounded. The next year he took Pignerol, and relieved Casal. In 1632 he defeated the rebels in Languedoc at the famous battle of Castelnaudri, for which he was made governor of that province. He wrote a narrative of the war of Italy; and died in 1632.

SCHOMBERG, FREDERIC ARMAND, duke of, was born of an illustrious family, but different from the preceding. He began his military career under Frederic Henry, prince of Orange, and his son William; but in 1630 he passed into the French service; became acquainted with Condé and Turenne; and obtained the government of Gravelines and Furnes. In 1661 he was sent to Portugal, where his success against the forces of Spain procured a favourable peace. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he left France and went to Brandenburg, the elector of which made him minister of state. He accompanied the prince of Orange to England at the Revolution, was created a peer, made knight of the garter, and obtained a grant of 100,000*l.* In 1680 he went with William to Ireland, and was accidentally shot as he was crossing the Boyne, by the French refugees of his own regiment.

SCHOMBERG, ISAAC, a naval officer and historian. He served as lieutenant in the American war; distinguished himself in the victory gained by admiral Rodney over count de Grasse; and was captain of the Culloden in lord Howe's fleet on "the glorious first of June," 1794. He eventually became a commissioner of the navy; and at his leisure devoted his attention to the composition of a work entitled "Naval Chronology," 5 vols. Died, 1813.

SCHREVELIUS, CORNELIUS, a learned critic, was born at Haarlem, about 1614. His father was rector of the school of Leyden, in which office he succeeded him. His name is now principally known by his "Greek and Latin Lexicon." Died, 1667.

SCHROEDER, JOHN JOACHIM, a learned Orientalist, born in Hesse Cassel, in 1680. He undertook a journey to Armenia, in order to prosecute his researches concerning the language of that country, and on his return published his "Thesaurus Lingue Armenicæ." He was, successively, professor of the Oriental tongues, ecclesiastical history, and theology, at Marburg; where he died in 1756.

SCHULEMBOURG, JOHN MATTHIAS, count de, a celebrated general, born at Magdeburgh, in 1661. He first served in the Danish army; after which he distinguished himself as a brave and skillful general in the wars of Poland, under Sobieski; on quitting which service he became generalissimo of the Venetian forces, and in 1716 gained great renown by his noble defence of Corfu against the Turks. Died, 1747.

SCHULTENS, ALBERT, a German divine, who has been designated the restorer of oriental literature in the 18th century, was born at Groningen, in 1696; became professor of Eastern languages at Franeker, and afterwards at Leyden; wrote several learned works, among which are "Origines Hebraicæ," and a "Commentary on the Book of Job;" and died in 1750.—JOHN JACOB, his son, who died in 1778; and HENRY ALBERT, his grandson, who died in 1793, were both distinguished by their knowledge of the oriental tongues, and filled the same situations at Leyden.

SCHULZE, JOHN HENRY, a German physician, was born at Colbitz, in the duchy of Magdeburgh, in 1657. He was professor of rhetoric and antiquities at Halle, and died there in 1745, with the reputation of being a profound scholar and an able anatomist.

SCHURMANN, ANNA MARIA DE, born at Cologne, in 1607, whose acquirements in the learned languages, the fine arts, and polite literature, were so great, that she obtained the appellation of the modern Sappho. This erudite and accomplished lady, who understood the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Chaldee, and several modern languages, and who was mistress of painting, engraving, sculpture, and music, at length became the victim of fanatical delusion. In 1650 she appeared as a zealous disciple of the enthusiast Labadie, to whom, it is said, she was secretly married; and, after his death she retired to Weivart, in Friesland, where she died in 1678. Her "Opuscula, or Pieces in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew," were printed in 1632. She also wrote "Latin Poems," and a "Defence of Female Study."

SCHWARTZ, BERTHOLD, a monk of the order of Cordeliers, at the end of the thirteenth century, was a native of Fribourg, in Germany, and an able chemist. It is said, that as he was making some experiments with nitre, it led to his invention of gunpowder, which was first applied to warlike purposes by the Venetians in 1300. There is, however, much discrepancy in the accounts of this discovery; and it is certain that Roger Bacon, who died in 1292, was acquainted with an inflammable composition similar to gunpowder, the knowledge of which Europeans appear to have derived from the Orientals.

SCHWARTZ, CHRISTIAN FREDERIC, a German missionary to the East Indies. In 1767, he was employed by the English Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, and he continued throughout his life to labour in the sacred cause, with unceasing zeal. He was held in high esteem for his character by the Hindoos; and the rajah of Tanjore made him tutor to his son. Died, 1798.

SCHWARTZENBURG, CHARLES PHILIP, prince, an Austrian field-marshal, was born of an ancient and illustrious family at Vienna, in 1771. He entered into the army early, and rapidly proceeded through all the grades of military rank until he became a general officer. After serving two campaigns against the Turks, he was employed in the first campaign against the French in the war that followed the execution of Louis XVI. On the death of the emperor Paul, in 1801, he was sent to St. Petersburg to congratulate Alexander on his accession. He served under general Mack in 1805; and succeeded in withdrawing the cavalry under his command from the consequences of the capitulation of Ulm. He also took a share in the battle of Austerlitz, which was fought against his advice, as well as in that of Wagram. In 1812 he was appointed to the command of the auxiliary force of 30,000 Austrians, extorted by Napoleon in aid of his disastrous invasion of Russia; and in 1813 he was invested with the rank of field-marshal, with the commandship-in-chief of all the armies allied against France. On the return of Buonaparte from Elba, he was again entrusted with the command of a great portion of the allied forces; and at the conclusion of the war was made president of the aulic council; which post he occupied until his death, in 1820.

SCIOPIUS, GASPAR, a learned German writer of the 17th century, but who, on account of his spiteful and injurious way of calumniating all that were eminent for their learning, was justly called the "Grammatical cur." Born 1576; died, 1649.

SCIPIO AFRICANUS (the Elder), PUBLIUS CORNELIUS, a renowned Roman general, who obtained his surname in honour of his conquests in Africa. His other signal military exploits were, his taking the new city of Carthage in a single day; his complete victory over Hannibal, the famous Carthaginian general; the defeat of Syphax, king of Numidia; and of Antiochus in Asia. He was as eminent for his chastity, and his generous behaviour to his prisoners, as for his valour. Neither his laurels, nor his spotless character, however, could protect him from the intrigues of his enemies in Rome; from which city he at length retired in disgust, and died at Liternum, his country seat, B.C. 189.

SCIPIO, LUCIUS CORNELIUS, surnamed ASIATICUS, was brother of the preceding, with whom he served in Spain and Africa. He obtained the consulate B.C. 166.

SCIPIO, EMILIANUS PUBLIUS, known as Africanus the Younger, was the son of Paulus Emilius, and was adopted by the son of Scipio Africanus. In his youth, he served in the army in Spain, when he obtained a mural crown for scaling the walls of a beleagued city, and conquered in single combat a gigantic Spaniard. He carried on the third Punic war, which ended in the destruction of Carthage, and the subjugation of the Carthaginians, B.C. 147. He was both a cultivator and a patron of literature. Died, B.C. 129.

SCOPAS, a celebrated Grecian sculptor, was a native of the Isle of Paros, and flourished in the fifth century B.C.

SCOPOLI, JOHN ANTHONY, an Italian naturalist and physician, was born in 1723, at Cavalese, in the Tyrol; and became, successively, first physician of the Tyrolean mines, professor of mineralogy at Chemnitz, and professor of botany and chemistry at Pavia. He wrote several works on botany and entomology. Died, 1797.

SCOTT, MICHAEL, a celebrated Scottish philosopher of the 13th century, whose knowledge of the occult sciences raised him to pass among the unlettered for a magician, was born at Balwirie, in Fife-shire. He travelled in France, Germany, and England, and was received with great distinction by the respective sovereigns; received the honour of knighthood from the Scottish monarch, Alexander III.; and died in 1293.

SCOTT, REGINALD, or REYNOLD, was a native of Kent, and received his education at Hart-hall, Cambridge. He had both the good sense and courage to oppose the absurd opinion, at that time prevalent, of the existence of witches, by publishing his "Discoveries of Witchcraft." Died, 1599.

SCOTT, JOHN, a learned English divine, born at Chippenham, in Wiltshire, in 1628. He became the rector of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, and a prebendary of St. Paul's; was author of "The Christian Life;" and died in 1694.

SCOTT, SAMUEL, an eminent painter of scenery, who took Vanderveide for his model, and often excelled him. Died, 1773.

SCOTT, DAVID, author of a "History of Scotland," was born near Haddington, in East Lothian, in 1675; and died in 1742.

SCOTT, JOHN, a quaker poet, born at Bermondsey, in 1739. He resided during the greater part of his life at Amwell; and died in 1783. He was the author of "Am-well," and other poems; a "Digest of the Highway Laws;" "Critical Essays," &c.

SCOTT, JAMES, an eloquent preacher, belonging to the church of England, was born at Leeds, in 1733; studied at Cambridge; and afterwards distinguished himself as a pulpit orator at Trinity church, Leeds, where he was lecturer. But he was still more noted as a political partisan, by writing in the public journals under the signatures of "Anti-Sejanus" and "Old Slyboots." Through the interest of Lord Sandwich, he was presented to the rectory of Simonbourn, in Northumberland, where he unfortunately got into a litigation with his parishioners, which lasted twenty years, and created such a hostile feeling against him, that he was compelled to remove to the metropolis, in order to ensure his personal safety. Died, 1814.

SCOTT, JOHN, the original editor of the "London Magazine," and the author of "A Visit to Paris in 1814," &c. His remarks on some articles in Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine having given offence to the editor of that work, a quarrel ensued, which ended in a duel between a friend of the editor and Mr. Scott, who, a few days after, died of the wound he had received from his adversary.

SCOTT, THOMAS, an English divine, born in 1747, at Braytoft, in Lincolnshire, was intended for the medical profession, but entered the church, and rendered himself celebrated as a theological writer. He became chaplain of the Lock Hospital in 1783, and rector of Aston Sandford in 1801; was the author of "The Force of Truth;" a "Defence of Calvinism;" a "Commentary on the Bible;" and "Sermons." Died, 1821.

SCOTT, HELENUS, an eminent physician, who, after receiving his education at Aberdeen and Edinburgh, visited London, and went to Venice with an intention of travelling over-land to India; but his pecuniary resources failing, he was under the necessity of returning to England. He, however, subsequently went thither, and realized a considerable fortune. He was the author of a romance, entitled "The Adventures of a Rupee." He died, while on a voyage to New South Wales, in 1821.

SCOTT, SIR WALTER, bart., who is generally placed at the head of English novelists in the 19th century, was born at Edinburgh, in 1771. He passed the years of his youth between the pleasures of hunting, the study of the law, and an indulgence of his taste in reading old plays, romances, travels, and marvellous adventures. The antiquities and ancient poetry of Scotland seem to have early inflamed his imagination; he read the old chronicles, and made himself acquainted with the customs, obsolete laws, and even the traditions of individual families, and was versed in the localities, and the superstitious belief of the inhabitants of the Scottish mountains. Thus he became an able antiquary; his natural genius rendered him a poet; and his correct judgment has subsequently caused him to be regarded as the patron of literature. He made his debut as an original author in "Specimens of Ancient Scottish Poetry," which had great success. His next work, the "Lay of the Last Minstrel," was received with still greater favour. "Marmion" and "Rokeby" followed, and gave a climax to his poetical reputation; but it was soon afterwards eclipsed by the rise of lord Byron's poetical star; his vigorous and impassioned verses diverting the public poetical taste into an entirely new channel. Subsequently appeared "Paul's Letters to his Kinsfolk," and the "Battle of Waterloo," the first successful, the latter a failure. His novels, however, are his great passport to fame. Those masterly productions, on which criticism would be out of place, need only be enumerated: "Waverley;" "Tales of my Landlord;" "Ivanhoe;" "The Monastery;" "The Abbott;" "Quentin Durward;" "Peveril of the Peak;" "Woodstock;" "Rob Roy;" the "Heart of Mid Lothian;" "Chronicles of the Canongate;" "Ivanhoe," &c. &c. Sir Walter Scott was made a baronet by George IV., in 1821, after the coronation; in giving effect to the splendid and antiquarian costumes of which, it appears, his taste and erudition were consulted. Our restricted limits prevent us from detailing, with anything like order or minuteness, the numerous engagements of this highly-gifted and industrious man: suffice it, therefore, to say, that from the commencement of his literary career in 1792, to the year of his decease, he was constantly producing some popular or talented work; and that he reaped an abundant harvest from the scattered seeds of his genius. His patrimonial estate was also considerable; and, in 1809, he obtained the preferment of sheriff of Seikirkshire, worth about 300*l.* a-year; which sum was considerably increased in 1806, by his being appointed one of the principal clerks of the session in Scotland. He accordingly, in 1811, removed six or seven miles below his former residence on the Tweed, where he purchased a farm of about 100 acres, for the purpose of having some more quiet outdoor occupation than field sports, and built a mansion, to which he gave the appellation of Abbotsford. Here he continued to reside, exercising the most open hospitality, and receiving the homage of admiration from all parts of the world; while he pursued his literary labours with unremitting activity. At length, in 1835, the firm of Constable and Co., at Edinburgh, having projected a cheap series of original and selected works, engaged Sir Walter to compose a "Life of Buonaparte." It was in progress when these publishers became bankrupts, and by that unhappy failure Scott found himself involved on their behalf, for accommodation bills, to the enormous amount of 120,000*l.* The estate of Abbotsford had been settled on Sir Walter's eldest son on his marriage, and it was therefore beyond the reach of the creditors: but though he had very little property to answer the immense amount of his debts, there was still a vast source of profit remaining—his literary talents. "Gentlemen," said he to his creditors, "time and I against any two. Let me take this good ally into company, and I believe I shall be able to pay you every farthing." He further proposed, in their behalf, to ensure the sum of 22,000*l.* upon his life, which proposal was accepted; and he then sat down, at the age of fifty-five, to the task of redeeming, by the exertion of his talents as a public writer, a debt exceeding a hundred thousand pounds! In the autumn of 1826 he visited Paris, in order to prosecute researches into several local and other details relating to the subject of his work; which appeared during the summer of 1827, in 9 vols. 8vo.; and realized the sum of 12,000*l.*, being at the rate of 3*l.* a day for the time he had devoted to it. Though from the time of the publication of "Waverley," Sir Walter had been generally considered the author of the "Scotch Novels," yet he had managed to preserve his incognito by various modes of evasion and half-denials whenever the subject was publicly mooted; and the author, whoever he might prove to be, was fancifully styled the "Great Unknown." At length, the mystery was solved. At the annual dinner of the Theatrical Fund Association in 1827, Sir Walter, in returning thanks for the honour which the company had done him by drinking his health, unreservedly declared that they were wholly and solely his own compositions. By the republication of the former novels, in a cheap form, with new notes and prefaces; and by new works, viz. "Tales of a Grandfather," a "History of Scotland," in Dr. Lardner's Encyclopædia; "Letters on Demonology and Witchcraft," in the Family Library, &c., he had paid, in part of his liabilities, 54,000*l.*; and his creditors presented to him, personally, the library, manuscripts, curiosities, and plate, which had once been his own, as a token of their gratified feelings. Early in 1831, symptoms of paralysis began to be manifested, and in the autumn his physicians recommended an excursion to Italy, as the means of delaying that illness which too obviously approached. A passage to Malta, in the Barham ship of war, was obtained for him, and he reached Naples, by that route, Dec. 27. In April, 1832, he went to Rome, inspected the classical antiquities of that city with great interest, and visited Tivoli, Albani, and Frascati. Feeling, however, that his strength was rapidly decreasing, he determined upon returning, with all possible speed; wishing to die in his native country. On his arrival in London it was found that medical assistance was now useless; all hope of his recovery had fled; and at his own anxious desire he was conveyed by sea to Newhaven, where he landed on the 9th of July, reached Abbotsoford on the 11th, and, after lingering for two months in a state of almost total insensibility, he died on the 21st of September, 1832.

SCOTTI, MARCELLO, a learned Neapolitan, born in 1742; having been nominated against his will a member of the legislature of the short-lived Neapolitan republic of 1799, he fell a victim to the fury of Ruffo and the counter-revolutionary party, on the triumph of the latter. He had been previously proscribed and persecuted for the too great freedom of his remarks in the "Mouarchia Universale Del Papi."

SEBASTIAN, king of Portugal, was born in 1554, and ascended the throne at three years of age, on the death of his grandfather, John III. Possessed of a romantic disposition, and an extravagant admiration of the glories of chivalry, he rashly determined to carry on war against the Moors in Africa, hoping thereby to effect something for Christianity and the fame of Portugal. He accordingly equipped a fleet and an army, which comprised the flower of the Portuguese nobility, and sailed for Africa, in 1578, at the age of twenty-three years. A general engagement soon took place, and the ardour of the young king bore him into the midst of the enemy, who were already pouring on the rear of his troops. Sebastian fought with the most determined bravery, while most of his attendants were slain by his side. He at length disappeared; and so complete was the slaughter, that no more than fifty Portuguese are said to have survived this wild and ill-fated expedition. The mystery which involved the fate of this royal madman led several adventurers to assume his person and his claims, but there seems to be no doubt that he died on the field of battle.

SECKER, THOMAS, archbishop of Canterbury, an eminent and pious prelate, was born at Sibthorpe, in Nottinghamshire, in 1683, and was educated with a view of becoming a dissenting minister. He, however, declared that he could not conscientiously assent to the tenets held by his family, and he therefore conformed to the church of England, took orders, and obtained preferment. He became, successively, rector of Houghton-le-Spring, prebendary of Durham, king's chaplain, and rector of St. James's, Westminster. In 1735 he was elevated to the see of Bristol; whence he was translated to that of Oxford, in 1737; and, in 1758, he was raised to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury; in which situation he conducted himself with great dignity, munificence, and proper severity against any laxity in the morals and manners of the clergy under his more especial superintendence. His sermons, charges, and other works, form 12 vols. Died, 1768.

SECUNDUS, JOANNES, a celebrated Latin poet, was born at the Hague, in 1811. His best known work is entitled "Basia, or the Kisses." Died, 1836.

SEDLEY, SIR CHARLES, a celebrated wit, courtier, and poet, of the age of Charles II., was born at Aylesford, in Kent, in 1629, and was educated at Wadham college, Oxford. He was a conspicuous character among the licentious circle which surrounded the gay monarch; but though himself a profligate, he was so much annoyed by an intrigue which James II. carried on with his daughter, afterwards created by that monarch, countess of Dorchester, that he took an active part in promoting the Revolution. Died, 1701.

SEED, JEREMIAH, a learned divine, was born at Clifton, in Cumberland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. He was afterwards presented to the rectory of Enham, in Hampshire; and died in 1747. His sermons are highly esteemed.

SEETZEN, ULRIC JASPER, a celebrated German traveller, was a native of East Friesland, and received his education in the university at Göttingen, where he particularly studied natural history and philosophy. Seconded by the patronage of the dukes Ernest and Augustus of Saxe-Gotha, in a desire to visit the interior of Africa, he commenced his perilous undertaking in 1802, at Constantinople, where he stayed six months. The ambassadors there assembled, encouraged his enterprise; and at Smyrna, the Russian prince Oczakow, who had been over Asia Minor and Egypt, assisted him with many useful instructions. Seetzen stopped one year at Aleppo to learn the Arabic language, and to collect MSS. for the library of the duke of Saxe-Gotha, and reached Damascus in April, 1805. From thence he explored many parts of Syria, Palestine, and Arabia, which had not before been visited by any European; and in order that he might be able to undertake a pilgrimage to Mecca and Medina, he made a profession of Mahometanism. In 1810 he was at Mocha, whence he wrote the last letters that arrived from him in Europe. Having had his property seized by the Arabs, under the pretence of his being a magician, he proceeded towards Saama, to complain to the iman of that place; and a few days after his departure, (December, 1811,) he died suddenly at Taes, probably from the effects of poison given him by order of the iman.

SEGAR, Sir WILLIAM, garter king at arms, was author of "Honour, Civil and Military." Died, 1633.

SEGRAIS, JOHN RENAUD DE, a celebrated French poet and novelist. Born, 1624; died, 1701.

SEGUIER, JOHN FRANCIS, an eminent botanist, was born at Nîmes, in 1703, and died in 1784. His works are "Bibliotheca Botanica," "Planta Veronenses," 3 vols.; and a translation of the works of Mafai.

SEGUR, JOSEPH ALEXANDER, viscount DE, second son of the marshal de Segur, engaged when young in the military service, but having attained the post of marshal de camp in 1790, he gave up his time entirely to the cultivation of literature, and published several romances, &c. Died, 1803.

SEGUR, LOUIS, count DE, a French diplomatist, and historical writer, was the eldest son of the marshal de Segur, and born in 1753. He served during two campaigns in the American war, and was afterwards ambassador to St. Petersburg and Berlin. On the overthrow of the French monarchy he relinquished his connexion with affairs of state; he was, notwithstanding, arrested by order of the Committee of Public Safety; but being liberated shortly after, he quitted France, and did not return till after the fall of Robespierre. In 1803, he was nominated to the council of state; and under the imperial government, he was appointed to the office of grand master of the ceremonies at court. In 1813 he was made a senator; and on the restoration of the Bourbon family he was created a peer of France; notwithstanding which, after Buonaparte's return from Elba, he resumed his legislative functions, and again became grand master of the ceremonies, and one of the peers appointed by Napoleon. On the final restoration of Louis XVIII. in 1815, the count was stripped of all his dignities, and passed the remainder of his life in literary retirement. He died in 1830. Among his works are, "A Political Picture of Europe;" "The Reign of Frederic William II.;" the "History of Modern Europe," &c.

SELDEN, JOHN, an English antiquary, law writer, and historian, of most extensive acquirements, was a native of Sussex, and born in 1584. After receiving his education at Chichester, and Hart Hall, Oxford, he studied the law in the Temple, and was called to the bar. He practised chiefly as a chamber counsel, and devoted much of his time to studying the history and antiquities of his country. So early as 1607 he drew up a work, entitled, "Analectum Anglo-Britannicum," which was quickly succeeded by several others; and in 1614, appeared his "Titles of Honour." Next followed his "De Diis Syriis," and "Mare Clausum," in which latter he endeavours to historically establish the British right of dominion over the circumjacent seas. He now entered the field of politics, and in 1640 was elected member of parliament for Oxford; at which time he was so well affected to the existing constitution of church and state, that when the king withdrew to York, he had some notion of appointing him chancellor. At the commencement of the disputes between Charles and the parliament he acted with great moderation, and uniformly endeavoured to prevent an ultimate appeal to the sword. In 1643, the House of Commons appointed him keeper of the records of the Tower, and the following year, one of the commissioners of the Admiralty, valuing him 5000*l.* as a reward for his services. He employed all his influence for the protection of learning, and was universally esteemed for his urbanity of manners and goodness of heart. Died, 1654.

SELEUCUS I., surnamed Nicator, or the Conqueror, one of the chief generals under Alexander the Great, and after his death, founder of the race of princes called Seleucidae. He is equally celebrated as a renowned warrior, and as the father of his people; yet his virtues could not protect him from the fatal ambition of Ceraunus, one of his courtiers, by whom he was assassinated, B.C. 280.

SELIS, NICHOLAS JOSEPH, a French poet, was born at Paris in 1737, and died in 1802.

SELKIRK, ALEXANDER, a sailor, was born at Largo, in Scotland, about 1690. He was a good navigator, and made several voyages to the South Sea, in one of which, having a quarrel with his commander, he was put ashore on the island of Juan Fernandez, with a few necessaries, a fowling-piece, gunpowder, and shot. Here he remained in solitude nearly three years, till he was taken away by Captain Woods Rogers, in 1709. On his return to England, he is said to have employed Daniel Defoe in drawing up a narrative of his adventures for the press, from which source originated the popular and interesting "Adventures of Robinson Crusoe."

SELLE, CHRISTIAN THEOPHILUS, born at Stettin, in Pomerania, in 1748, was physician to Frederic the Great, a particular detail of whose last illness he published. In 1790 he went to Paris, where he visited the hospitals and other public establishments; and on his return he published two memoirs on animal magnetism, and others against the critical philosophy of Kant, in the Transactions of the Berlin Academy of Sciences, of which he was a member. He wrote several medical works, and was appointed privy-counsellor and director of the college of medicine, &c. Died, 1800.

SELLON, BAKER JOHN, a barrister, was born in 1762. He was the son of the Rev. W. Sellon, minister of Clerkenwell church, and educated at St. John's college, Oxford. He was called to the bar in 1792, and afterwards admitted to the rank of serjeant-at-law in 1798. For the last twenty years of his life he sat as a police magistrate, having been compelled by deafness to relinquish his avocations as a pleader. He published an "Analysis of the Practice of the Court of King's Bench and Common Pleas," 3 vols. 8vo., which, by the profession generally, is regarded as a standard book. Died, 1835.

SEMLER, JOHN SOLOMON, a celebrated Lutheran divine, born at Snaifeld, in Saxony, in 1725, and became professor of theology at Halle, where he remained till his death, in 1791. He was so determined to explain away every thing miraculous in the Gospel history, and criticized the Bible with such temerity, that he appeared more like an advocate of infidelity than of Revelation. His principal work is entitled "Historicæ Ecclesiasticæ selecta capita," 3 vols.

SENEBIER, JOHN, a natural philosopher and historian, was born at Geneva, in 1743. He adopted the ecclesiastical profession, but his attention was more particularly directed to philosophy and natural history. He obtained the office of public librarian at Geneva in 1773; became one of the conductors of the Geneva Journal in 1787; and died in 1809. Among his chief works are, "A Literary History of Geneva," and "Vegetable Physiology."

SENECA, LUCIUS ANNAEUS, a celebrated Roman philosopher, moralist, and statesman, the son of Marcus Annaeus, an eminent orator, was born at Corduba, in Spain, during the first year of the Christian era. His reputation soon extended to the imperial court; and his various learning and practical wisdom caused him to be appointed tutor to Nero, and procured him several important places. After his accession to the throne, his imperial pupil for awhile loaded him with favours; but at length, resolving to rid himself of his old preceptor, the tyrant charged him with being an accomplice in the conspiracy of Piso, and he was condemned to death. The method of his execution was, however, left to his own choice. He consequently, with the characteristic ostentation of a stoic, finished his life in the midst of his friends, conversing on philosophical topics while the blood was flowing from his veins, which he had caused to be opened for that purpose. He was a man of undoubted genius, but rapacious and intriguing; accumulating vast wealth by the most unjustifiable means. Dion Cassius ascribes the revolt of the Britons under Boadicea to the distress to which they were driven through the rapacity of Seneca and his agents. His death happened A.D. 65.

SENNERTUS, DANIEL, an eminent physician and medical writer of Germany. Born, 1572; died, 1637.

SEPULVEDA, JOHN GINEX DE, born in 1491, was historiographer to the emperor Charles V., and rendered himself ignominiously conspicuous as the author of a "Vindication of the Cruelties of the Spaniards against the Indians," in opposition to the benevolent representations of Las Casas. He was also the author of a "Life of Charles V.," 4 vols.

SERASSI, PIER ANTONIO, an Italian biographer, born at Bergamo, in 1721. He wrote the lives of Tasso, Dante, Molza, Politian, Petrarca, and other eminent Italians, which are much esteemed. Died, 1791.

SERGEI, JOHN TOBIAS, a celebrated Swedish sculptor, was born at Stockholm, in 1740; studied in Italy, and rose to great eminence in his art; was ennobled on his return to Sweden; and died in 1814. His numerous able works are chiefly confined to Sweden; but an admired "Diomedes stealing the Palladium of Troy" is in England.

SERRES, OLIVER DE, a French agriculturist, was born in 1630, near Viviers, and died in 1619. His "Theatre of Agriculture" is an esteemed work.

SERRES, OLIVE, the self-styled princess of Cumberland, was born at Warwick, in 1772, and educated under the protection of her uncle, the Rev. Dr. Wilmot. At an early age she married Mr. Serres, marine painter to George III.; but after a few years they separated, and she had to support herself and children by her own efforts. She was both an artist and an authoress, and was appointed landscape-painter to the prince of Wales; but her literary performances were certainly of no very high order. As this female attracted a large share of the public attention for a number of years; and as there were not a few who, after inspecting the mass of documents she possessed, really believed her to be the legitimate daughter of Henry Frederick, duke of Cumberland, by a marriage with the sister of Dr. Wilmot, we shall here give the outlines of a history, which those who opposed her claims declared was a barefaced imposture. That she had convinced many, there is no doubt, and, perhaps, the striking "family likeness" observable in her features, contributed not a little to give a plausibility to her statements. In 1815, it appears, she first became acquainted with the secret of her birth; at least it was so alleged in the affidavits produced by her counsel in the Prerogative Court, in order to obtain the sum of 15,000*l.* bequeathed to her by a will of George III., to which the sign-manual and attesting signatures were attached. It was also alleged that, in the year 1815, the earl of Warwick, in presence of the duke of Kent, informed her, at her own house,

In Seymour-place, that she was the lawful daughter of the late duke of Cumberland. He exacted a solemn pledge, both from her and the duke of Kent, not to disclose this communication until after the death of the king; and ultimately (in presence of the royal duke) deposited with her the proofs she possessed; among which was the sign-manual for the 15,000*l*. The folly, inconsistency, want of principle, and, it may be truly added, insanity of many of her actions, would certainly go far towards defeating her claims, whether just or unjust. In June, 1822, Sir Gerard Noel was induced to move for an investigation of her claims in the House of Commons, and was seconded by Mr. Hume; but Sir Robert Peel saw there was abundant room for a laugh at the expense of the old-dissat princess and her supporter; and, in a vein of successful irony, he overturned the whole fabric that had been raised to support "the princess Olive's claims." Her latter years were passed in poverty, within the rules of a prison, in consequence of debts contracted while under her delusion of royalty; having at that time commenced a splendid establishment, assumed the royal livery, &c. She was at length liberated; and went to reside with Miss Macauley, at Somers-town, a short time previous to her death, which occurred in 1834, at the age of 52.

SERVETUS, MICHAEL, a learned Spaniard, memorable as the victim of religious intolerance, was born at Villaneuva, in 1509; was educated at Toulouse; studied medicine at Paris; and was in constant correspondence with Calvin, whom he consulted in respect to his Arian notions. He published several anti-trinitarian works, which excited against him the violent hatred of both Catholics and Protestants; and though he was so fortunate as to escape from the persecutions of the former, he could not elude the vengeance of the latter, headed and incited as they were by his implacable enemy, the stern and unforgiving reformer of Geneva. He was seized as he was passing through that city, tried for "blasphemy and heresy," and condemned to the flames, which sentence was carried into execution Oct. 27, 1553.

SERVIUS TULLIUS, king of the Romans, was the son of a female slave. He married the daughter of Tarquin the elder, whom he succeeded B.C. 577, and was murdered by his son-in-law, Tarquin the Superb, B.C. 534.

SESSA, an Indian philosopher or mathematician, and the inventor of the game of chess. He lived about the 11th century.

SETTLE, ELKANAH, an English poet of the 17th century, was born at Danstable, in Bedfordshire, 1648, and educated at Trinity college, Oxford. He was much engaged in the political squabbles of the age, and wrote some smart pieces both in prose and verse. He was also an indefatigable writer for the stage, but none of his dramas are now acted. Died, 1794.

SEVERUS, CORNELIUS, a Roman poet, who lived in the reign of Augustus. He was the author of "Ætina," a poem, which has been attributed to Virgil.

SEVERUS, in church history, a sectary of the second century, a follower of Tatian, and chief of the sect of the Severians. He flourished about A.D. 178.

SEVERUS I., LUCIUS SEPTIMIUS, a Roman emperor, was born A.D. 146, at Leptis, in Africa, and was raised to the throne on the death of Didius Julianus. He has been so much admired for his military talents, that some have called him the most warlike of the Roman emperors. As a monarch he was cruel; and it has been observed that he never performed an act of humanity, or forgave a fault. He loved the appellation of a man of letters, and he even composed a history of his own reign, which some have praised for its correctness and veracity. He died at York, in 211.

SEVERUS II., FLAVIUS VALERIUS, a short lived emperor, who was raised to the purple by Galerius; but, being deserted by his soldiers when ready to engage Maxentius, he killed himself, A.D. 307.

SEVERUS, SULPICIUS, a historian, was a native of Aquitaine, who flourished in the beginning of the fifth century, and by his writings acquired the title of the Christian Salust.

SEVIGNE', MARY DE RABUTIN, marchioness de, daughter of the baron de Chantal, was born in 1626. At the age of eighteen, she married the marquis de Sevigne, who was killed in a duel seven years afterwards. Being thus left a widow, with two children, she paid great attention to their education; and when her daughter married the count de Grignan, she kept up a correspondence with her; to which circumstance the world is indebted for those letters which are regarded as models of epistolary composition. Died, 1696.

SEWARD, WILLIAM, a biographical writer, was born in London, in 1747. He was educated at the Charter-house and at Oxford; was intimate with Dr. Johnson, and other eminent literary characters; and was the author of "Anecdotes of Distinguished Persons;" "Biographiana," &c. He died in 1799.

SEWARD, ANNA, daughter of the Rev. Thomas Seward, born at Eyam, in Derbyshire, in 1747. She evinced a poetical taste in early life, but was discouraged from indulging it by her parents. At length, on contracting an acquaintance with lady Miller, she ventured to become a contributor to her vase, at Bath-Easton. After this, she published elegiac poems on major André and captain Cook, and in 1782 her poetical romance of "Louisa." She subsequently printed a collection of sonnets, and a "Life of Dr. Darwin," in which she asserted her claim to the first fifty lines of that author's "Botanic Garden." Died, 1806.

SEWELL, WILLIAM, the son of an English refugee at Amsterdam, who, though brought up as a weaver, made himself master of several languages, and compiled an "English and Dutch Dictionary;" but he is best known by his "History of the Quakers," of which sect he was himself a member. Died, 1725.

house, Cambridge, studied medicine in Holland under the celebrated Boerhaave, and settled at Hampstead as a physician. His chief literary productions are, "Sir Walter Raleigh," a tragedy; "A Vindication of the English Stage," translations of parts of Lucan, Ovid, and Tibullus; and "Epistles to Mr. Addison." Died, 1736.

SEXTIUS, QUINTUS, a Pythagorean philosopher, in the time of Augustus. He refused the senatorial rank, and established a school upon the most rigid principles of self-denial.

SEXTUS EMPIRICUS, a Greek philosopher and physician, who lived in the reign of Commodus. Only two of his works are extant, the "Institutes of Pyrrhonism," and ten books against the mathematicians.

SEYMOUR, EDWARD, duke of Somerset, in the reign of Edward VI., to whom he was maternal uncle, being brother of Jane Seymour, third wife to Henry VIII. He devoted himself to the military profession, and commanded in a maritime expedition against the Scots, in 1544, when he landed a body of troops at Leith, and set fire to the city of Edinburgh. On the death of Henry VIII. he rose to unbounded power, procuring himself to be appointed governor of the king, and protector of the realm. In 1548, he obtained the post of lord treasurer, was created duke of Somerset, and made earl-marshal. The same year he headed an army, with which he invaded Scotland, and after having gained the victory of Musselburgh, returned in triumph to England. His success excited the jealousy of the earl of Warwick and others, who first procured his confinement in the Tower, for a short time during 1549, on the charge of arbitrary conduct and injustice; and finally caused him to be again arrested, two years afterwards, on the charge of treasonable designs against the lives of some of the privy-councillors; for which he was beheaded on Tower-hill, Jan. 22, 1552.

SFORZA, JAMES, called the Great, was born of mean parentage, at Cotignola, in 1639. A company of soldiers happening to pass through his village, young Sforza joined them, and after passing through the inferior military ranks, became a general. He obliged Alphonsus, king of Arragon, to raise the siege of Naples, and he retook several important places which had revolted; but being too eager in pursuing the flying enemy, he was drowned in the river near Pescara, in 1424.

SFORZA, FRANCIS, natural son of the preceding, commanded with distinction in the service of Naples; after which he married the daughter of the duke of Milan, on whose death he was chosen general of the duchy; but he abused that trust, and usurped the sovereignty. Died, 1466.

SHADWELL, THOMAS, a dramatic poet, was born in 1640, at Stanton-hall, Norfolk, and was educated at Cambridge. When Dryden was removed from the offices of laureate and historiographer-royal, Shadwell was appointed his successor, which exposed him to the severity of that poet's satire, who ridiculed him under the appellation of MacFlecknoe. Died, 1692. His principal plays are "Epsom Wells," "Timon the Misanthrope," the "Virtuoso," the "Gentleman of Alsatie," and the "Lancashire Witches."—CHARLES SHADWELL, supposed to have been the son or nephew of the preceding, wrote some plays, the best of which is entitled the "Fair Quaker of Deal." Died, 1728.

SHAKESPEARE, WILLIAM, the most illustrious dramatic poet of England, was born at Stratford-upon-Avon, April 23, 1564, and was the son of a dealer in wool, who appears also to have carried on the business of a butcher. His education was confined to what he could attain at the free-school of his native place; and being taken from it early, he made no farther progress than the rudiments of Latin. In his 18th year, he married Ann Hathaway, a farmer's daughter, who was considerably older than himself. Of his occupation at this period, nothing determinate is recorded; but it appears that he was wild and irregular, and that he was more than once concerned with others in stealing deer from the park of Sir Thomas Lucy, of Charlton, near Stratford. For this he was prosecuted by that gentleman; but he retaliated by a severe lampoon on him, and then fled to London, in order to escape another prosecution. Here he formed an acquaintance with the players, and was enrolled among them, though what sort of characters he performed does not appear. Mr. Rowe observes, that he could never meet with any further account of him as an actor, than that his highest part was the Ghost in his own Hamlet. Queen Elizabeth had several of his plays acted before her, and without doubt gave him many marks of her favour. She was so pleased with the character of Falstaff in the two parts of Henry IV. that she commanded him to exhibit him in love, on which occasion Shakespeare wrote his rich and admirable comedy of the "Merry Wives of Windsor." His greatest patron was the earl of Southampton, who is said on one occasion to have presented him with a thousand pounds; and he enjoyed the friendship of his most eminent literary contemporaries. Having become proprietor and manager of the Globe theatre, he realized a handsome fortune, which enabled him to spend the close of his life at his native town, where he purchased a house and estate, to which he gave the name of New Place. The house and lands continued in the possession of the poet's descendants till the Restoration, when they were repurchased by the Clopton family. Here Shakespeare planted the famous mulberry tree, which remained an object of profit to the people of Stratford, and of veneration to visitors, till about 1759, when the possessor, out of hatred to the inhabitants, cut it down. Shakespeare died on his fifty-second birth-day, in 1616, and was buried in the church of Stratford, where his monument still remains. In 1741, a monument was erected to him in Westminster abbey, and paid for by the proceeds of benefits at the two great theatres. In 1769, by the efforts of Garrick, a festival was celebrated in honour of the poet, in his native town. The only notice recorded of the person of Shakespeare, is to be found in Aubrey, who says that "he was a hand-

Besides his immortal plays, Shakespeare was the author of two poems, "Venus and Adonis," and "Lucrece," which, although lost in the blaze of his dramatic genius, exhibit much of poetry that is worthy of admiration.

SHARP, JAMES, archbishop of St. Andrew's, a distinguished prelate of the seventeenth century, was born in Banffshire, in 1618, and obtained a professorship in the university of St. Andrew's. The presbytery being overturned by parliament, under Charles II., Sharp, who had treacherously promoted that measure, was rewarded with the primacy, and appointed archbishop of St. Andrew's. The wanton cruelties which followed, confirmed the horror entertained against him, and raised the fury of some of his more bigotted opponents to conspire against his life. His carriage, in which he was travelling, about three miles from St. Andrew's, on the 3rd of May, 1679, was met by some fanatics, headed by John Balfour, of Burley, who were waiting there to intercept a servant of the archbishop's, named Carmichael. To tempers thus heated by fanaticism, the appearance of the archbishop himself was deemed a sign of the intention of Providence to substitute a more important victim; and, regardless of the tears and entreaties of his daughter, they dragged him from his carriage, and, with savage ferocity, murdered him before her face.

SHARP, JOHN, a learned prelate, and theological writer, was born at Bradford, in Yorkshire, in 1644; studied at Christ's college, Cambridge; and rose, by gradual preferments, to the deanery of Norwich. In the reign of James II., he gave such offence to the court, by preaching against popery, that an order was sent to the bishop of London to suspend him; which his lordship refused to do, as contrary to law; for which resistance to an arbitrary mandate, the diocesan was suspended, as well as Dr. Sharp, by the ecclesiastical commission. The doctor, however, was soon restored to the exercise of his function, and after the Revolution he was made dean of Canterbury, from whence, in 1661, he was elevated to the archbishopric of York. Died, 1713. His "Sermons," published after his death, form 7 vols.

SHARP, THOMAS, a younger son of the preceding, was born about 1693; received his education at Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow and D.D. in 1729; obtained various preferments in the church; finally became archdeacon of Northumberland and a prebendary of Durham; and died in 1758. He wrote "Discourses on the Hebrew Tongue," &c.

SHARP, GRANVILLE, a son of the preceding, distinguished for his philanthropy and learning, was born at Durham, in 1734. He obtained a place in the Ordnance office, which he resigned at the commencement of the American war, because he disapproved of its principles; after which he devoted his life to private study, and the active exercise of a benevolent mind. With infinite difficulty and expense, he established the right of negroes to their freedom while in England; instituted the society for the abolition of the slave trade; advocated the principles of parliamentary reform; and distinguished himself with equal zeal in other patriotic and benevolent objects; the last of which was the promotion of the distribution of the Scriptures. He was critically skilled in the Hebrew and Greek languages; and was the author of various works, the principal of which are, "Remarks on the Uses of the Definitive Article in the Greek Testament;" a "Short Treatise on the English Tongue;" "Remarks on the Prophecies," Treatises on the "Slave Trade," on "Duelling," the "People's Right to a Share in the Legislature," the "Law of Nature, and Principles of Action in Man," &c. Died, 1813.

SHARP, WILLIAM, an eminent engraver, was born in London, in 1740; rose to excellence in his profession; and produced many admirable prints. But with all his merit as an artist, he was weak and credulous to an astonishing degree; and became, in succession, a believer in the mysterious reveries of Mesmer and Swedenbourg, a dupe of the notorious Richard Brothers, and a supporter of the infamous pretensions of Joanna Southcott. Died, 1824.

SHARP, RICHARD, a gentleman well known in the literary world as "Conversation Sharp," and whose taste and judgment as a critic were equal to his conversational powers, died, aged 76, while on the road from Torquay to his residence in London, March 30, 1835. Mr. Sharp was deeply engaged in commercial concerns, but employed his leisure hours in literary pursuits; and had he more devoted himself to study and composition, he might have taken a high station among the best writers of the day. He was the author of "Letters and Essays in Prose and Verse." He had formerly been an M.P. adhering to the Whig interest; and few men displayed more anxiety than he did for the extension of civil and religious liberty, and the moral improvement of the community. He left 250,000*l.* which was divided between his nephews and nieces.

SHARPE, GREGORY, an eminent Oriental scholar and able divine, was born in Yorkshire, in 1713; was educated at Westminster and Aberdeen; and eventually became master of the Temple. Among his writings are, a "A Review of the Controversy on the Demoniacs;" "Defence of Dr. Clarke against the Attacks of Leibnitz;" "Dissertations on the Origin of Languages, and the Powers of Letters, with a Hebrew Lexicon;" "Dissertations on the Latin and Greek Tongues;" "Three Discourses in Defence of Christianity;" an "Introduction to Universal History;" and "The Rise and Fall of the City and Temple of Jerusalem." Died, 1771.

SHAW, THOMAS, an English divine and antiquary, famous for his "Travels, or Observations relating to several parts of Barbary and the Levant." Born, 1692; died, 1751.

SHAW, DR. PETER, an English physician, and editor of "Bacon's Philosophical Works." Died, 1763.

SHAW, CUTHBERT, a poet of very humble origin, born at Richmond, in Yorkshire, in 1739. He was usher at a school in Darlington, and while there he published a poem, entitled "Liberty." He afterwards joined a company of comedians, under the name of Seymour; but he relinquished the stage about 1762, and became a professional writer. In 1766 he published the "Race," a satire against most of the living poets; and on the death of his wife, he produced a pathetic "Monody," esteemed his best performance. He lived a life of intemperance and debauchery; and he died in wretchedness and poverty, in 1786.

SHAW, STEPHEN, a divine and topographer, was born in 1762, at Stone, in Staffordshire, and was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. He became tutor to Sir Francis Burdett, with whom he made a tour to the Highlands, and published an account of the journey. He also wrote a "Tour in the West of England;" "A History of Staffordshire;" and "The Topographer," which was published in periodic numbers. He died, rector of Harthorpe, in Staffordshire, in 1802.

SHAW, GEORGE, a distinguished writer on zoology, &c., was born in 1751, at Birtton, in Buckinghamshire; was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford; studied medicine at Edinburgh; and graduated as M.D. at Oxford. He then settled as a physician in London; was elected F.R.S., and appointed a vice-president of the Linnæan Society; delivered lectures on zoology at the Leverian Museum, and at the Royal Institution; and was made librarian and assistant keeper of natural history at the British Museum. He was the author of several works on "Zoology;" conducted the "Naturalist's Miscellany;" and was one of the editors of the abridged Philosophical Transactions. Died, 1813.

SHEA, DAVID, one of the professors of oriental languages at Hallebury College, was born at Dublin, in 1772, and educated at its university. Having held a situation as chief clerk to a large mercantile establishment in Malta, which had extensive connexions in the East, he studied the Arabic and Persian tongues; and his oriental acquirements becoming known, a situation at Hallebury was provided for him. He translated "Mirskoud's History of the early Kings of Persia," and at the time of his death was engaged in the translation of the Dabestan. This work he had completed, and it was presented to the Asiatic Society after his death. Died, 1838.

SHEBBEARE, JOHN, a physician and political writer, was born at Bideford, in Devonshire, in 1702, where he was apprenticed to an apothecary. Having made a visit to Paris, he there obtained the degree of M.D., and was admitted into the academy of sciences. He settled in London, and commenced his career as a party writer; for his violence in which character he was once pilloried and twice imprisoned. Afterwards, under the administration of lord Bute, he apostatized from the popular cause, and obtained a pension. His chief works are, "Letters to the People of England;" "The Marriage Act," a satirical romance; "Lydia, or Filial Piety;" "Letters on the English Nation;" and the "History of the Samatras," a political satire. Died, 1788.

SHELDON, GILBERT, an eminent prelate, was born at Stanton, in Staffordshire, in 1508. On the death of archbishop Junon he was raised to the primacy, and expended above £6,000. in charitable uses. But the greatest of his works was building the theatre at Oxford. He died in 1677.

SHELLEY, PERCY BYSSHE, an eminent modern poet, eldest son of Sir Timothy Shelley, Sussex, was born at Field-place, in that county, in 1792. He was sent to Eton, whence, owing to his eccentricity of character, which led him to neglect the studies, and violate the rules of the school, he was removed to Oxford, much before the usual period. Here a repetition of youthful irregularities, deeply aggravated by his open avowal of atheism, occasioned his expulsion; and his family, naturally offended with his conduct and irreligious opinions, were still further estranged by an ill-assorted marriage. After the birth of a boy and a girl, he separated from his wife, who died shortly after; which event exposed him to much obloquy and misrepresentation. Mr. Shelley then married Miss Godwin, daughter of the author of "Political Justice" and the famed "Mary Wollstonecroft," and soon after retired to Marlow, in Buckinghamshire, where he wrote his "Revolt of Islam." About this time the guardianship of his children was taken from him, by an order of the chancery, on the ground of alleged atheistical and sceptical notions, and of certain avowed opinions regarding the intercourse of the sexes, which were deemed immoral and dangerous. He now repaired to Italy, with his second wife and a new family, and renewed an acquaintance with lord Byron, to whom he had been known during a former visit to the continent. There, in conjunction with his lordship and Mr. Leigh Hunt, he contributed to "The Liberal," a periodical miscellany, which contained the "Vision of Judgment," by lord Byron, and other original productions; but which, partly owing to Shelley's untimely death, was very soon discontinued. He was drowned by the wreck of his own small sailing-boat in a violent storm, on his return from Leghorn to his house, on the gulf of Lerici, July 8, 1822. Fifteen days afterwards, his body was discovered, and, agreeably to his own desire, often expressed to his friend Byron, it was burnt on the sea-shore, and the ashes conveyed to Rome, where they are interred in the burial-ground near the pyramid of Caius Cestus. The poetical works of this writer are, "Prometheus Chained;" "Alastor, or the Spirit of Solitude;" "Queen Mab;" and "Cenci;" the whole of which display a poetical genius of no common order, though blighted by the pestilential miasma of infidelity.

SHENSTONE, WILLIAM, an English poet, born in 1714, at Hales Owen, in Shropshire, was the son of a gentleman farmer residing on his own estate, called the Leasowes. He was educated at Oxford; and on coming into possession of his paternal property, he relinquished all views of an active life, and occupied himself with rural embellishments, and the cultivation of poetry. His great desire to render the Lesawes famous for picturesque beauty and elegance, led to expenses which he could but ill support, and he was by no means a happy inhabitant of the Eden which he had created. His works, which consist of songs, elegies, pastorals, and miscellaneous essays, were printed in 3 vols. 8vo. by Dodsley. As a poet, he is pleasing, tender, and correct in sentiment; and his prose works display good sense and cultivated taste. Died, 1783.

SHEPREVE, JOHN, an English writer, of the 16th century, was born in Berkshire, and educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, where he became Hebrew professor about 1536. He had a surprising memory, and was one of the most learned men of his time. Died, 1542.

SHERARD, or SHERWOOD, WILLIAM, an English botanist, was born in Leicestershire, in 1639. About 1703 he was appointed consul at Smyrna, and during his residence in the East he collected specimens of all the plants of Natolia and Greece, and made observations on subjects of natural history and antiquities. He died in 1728; and by his will gave 3000*l.* to provide a salary for a professor of botany at Oxford. He published Herman's "Paradisius Batavus;" and a work entitled "Schola Botanica."

SHERBURNE, SIR EDWARD, an ingenious writer, was born in London, in 1618. He held the office of clerk of the ordnance under Charles I., and suffered greatly during the civil war; but was restored to his office, and knighted by Charles II. Died, 1702. He translated "Seneca's Tragedies," the "Sphere of Marcus Manilius," and other works, into English, and wrote a volume of poems.

SHERIDAN, DR. THOMAS, (the well-known friend of Dean Swift), was born in 1684, and died in 1738. He was eminent as a teacher; but being singularly thoughtless and extravagant, he closed his life in great poverty. He was the author of some sermons, and of a translation of the satires of Persius.

SHERIDAN, THOMAS, son of the preceding, was born in 1721, at Quilca, in Ireland, and was educated at Westminster school, and at Trinity college, Dublin. In 1742 he went upon the stage, and gained much celebrity as a tragedian, both in his native country and in England. He next became manager of the Dublin company; but being ruined by the opposition of a rival theatre, and by riots in his own, he relinquished the profession, and commenced as a lecturer on elocution, which for a time was very successful. During the ministry of lord Bute, he obtained a pension of 300*l.* a-year. He subsequently became manager of Drury-lane theatre; but some disputes taking place, he retired from the situation, and resumed his attention to oratory. His principal works are, an "Orthoepical Dictionary of the English Language," and a "Life of Swift." Died, 1788.

SHERIDAN, FRANCES, wife of the preceding, was the writer of "Sidney Biddulph," a novel; "Nourjahad," an eastern tale; and the comedies of "The Discovery," and "The Dupe." Born, 1724; died, 1767.

SHERIDAN, RICHARD BRINSLEY, third son of the preceding, distinguished as a statesman, wit, and dramatist, was born at Dublin, in 1731. He was educated at Harrow school, and became a student of the Middle Temple; but was not called to the bar. His first dramatic attempt was "The Rivals," which was acted at Covent-garden in 1775, with moderate success; but the "Duenna," a musical entertainment, which followed, was received with general admiration; and his "School for Scandal," gained him the highest reputation as a comic writer. On the retirement of Garrick from Drury-lane theatre, Sheridan purchased a share in that property, which qualified him for a seat in parliament; and, in 1780, he was chosen member for the borough of Stafford. He attained distinguished celebrity as an orator, and made the grandest display of eloquence during the progress of the impeachment of Warren Hastings. The political changes consequent on the death of Pitt, in 1806, occasioned the exaltation of the party with which Sheridan was connected, and he obtained the lucrative post of treasurer of the navy, and the rank of a privy counsellor. This administration being weakened by the loss of Mr. Fox, who survived his celebrated rival only a few months, new alterations took place, and Sheridan was deprived of office, to which he never returned. At the general election in 1806, he obtained a seat for Westminster, the great object of his ambition; but he was afterwards nominated for the borough of Ilchester, which he continued to represent during the remainder of his parliamentary career. The latter part of the life of this highly talented individual was embittered by misfortunes, principally arising from his own improvidence. His profuse habits involved him deeply in debt; his failure of a seat in parliament deprived him of protection from arrest; intemperance had undermined his constitution; mental anxiety completed the destruction of his health; and his death took place amidst a complication of difficulties, fears, and sorrows, July 7, 1816. Besides the pieces already noticed, he was the author of part of "A Translation of Aristænetus;" the farces of "The Critic," a "Trip to Scarborough," and "St. Patrick's Day;" a "Letter to Henry Dundas;" "Pizarro," a drama altered from Kotzebue; and poems. Mr. Sheridan was twice married; first to Miss Linley, a celebrated singer; and the second time to Miss Ogle, daughter of the dean of Winchester.

SHERLOCK, WILLIAM, an eminent English divine, born in 1641. He became dean of St. Paul's, and wrote numerous books and pamphlets, the greater part of which were of the controversial kind. His "Practical Treatise on Death," however, has been highly valued and very much read. Died, 1770.

was distinguished as a warm and spirited controversial writer. His works are very numerous, and his sermons particularly to be admired for their ingenuity and elegance. He was, successively, dean of Chichester, and bishop of Bangor, Salisbury, and London. Died, 1761.

SHERWIN, JOHN KEYS, an eminent engraver, who, till the age of nineteen, exercised the humble occupation of a wood-cutter. He was at that period employed on the estate of Mr. Mitford, near Petworth, in Sussex; and being one day at the house of that gentleman, the attention with which he observed some of the family who were drawing, attracted Mr. Mitford's notice, who asked him if he could do any thing in that way? Sherwin said that he could not tell, but he should like to try. On this a porcrayon was put into his hand, and he produced such a drawing as astonished all present; and the Society of Arts, to whom it was presented, voted him the silver medal. He was then placed under Bartolozzi, and became his favourite pupil. His engravings are in a style of the first excellence. He died in 1790.

SHIELD, WILLIAM, an eminent musical composer, was born at Swatwell, Durham, in 1754. His father, who was a teacher of singing, and who had given him a taste for music, died when the son was in his ninth year. He was apprenticed to a boat-builder, but quitted that business as soon as his indentures expired, for he had never ceased to cultivate the knowledge of the violin, which he had early acquired. It was not long before he gained very considerable reputation at Scarborough, &c. as the leader at the principal concerts, which led to his being offered a situation in the orchestra of the Italian Opera-house, where he remained eighteen years as principal violist. In 1778 he came forward as a dramatic composer in the music to "The Fitch of Bacon," the success of which was great and decisive. It procured for him the situation of composer to Covent-garden theatre, which he held for several years. At the death of Sir W. Parsons he was appointed master of his majesty's musicians in ordinary; and he continued to enjoy a high degree of popularity to the time of his death, which took place in January, 1820. His style was simple, chaste, and graceful. Among his dramatic pieces are, "Rosina;" the "Poor Soldier;" "Robin Hood;" "Marian;" "Oscar and Malvina;" "Harford Bridge," &c. He also set to music many excellent songs, as "Tom Moody;" "The Heaving of the Lead;" "The Thorn;" "Old Tower," &c. &c.

SHIPLEY, JONATHAN, an English prelate, was born in 1714. He was educated at Christchurch, Oxford; and became, successively, dean of Winchester, bishop of Llandaff, and bishop of St. Asaph. He died in 1758, leaving a son, who became dean of St. Asaph; and two daughters, one of whom married Sir William Jones. The works of the bishop were published in 2 vols.

SHIRLEY, ANTHONY, a celebrated English traveller, was born at Weston, in Sussex, in 1563. On leaving Oxford university, he served under the earl of Essex, with such reputation as to receive the honour of knighthood. He next went to Italy, and from thence travelled to Persia, where he became a favourite with Shah Abbas, who in 1612 sent him as his ambassador to England. After this, the emperor of Germany created him a count, and the king of Spain appointed him admiral in the Levant seas. He died in Spain about 1630.

SHIRLEY, JAMES, an eminent English dramatic writer and poet of the Elizabethan age, was born in London, about 1584; was educated at Merchant Tailors' school, and at St. John's college, Oxford; obtained a curacy at St. Alban's, which he resigned on becoming a Catholic; and then endeavoured, though without success, to establish a grammar-school there. He next removed to London, and became a fertile writer for the stage; and, having obtained considerable celebrity, he was taken into the service of queen Henrietta Maria. He afterwards accompanied the earl of Kildare to Ireland, but returned on the breaking out of the rebellion, and resumed his scholastic employment in the Whitefriars. At the Restoration many of his plays were again acted, and he appears to have been comparatively prosperous; but having lost all his property by the fire of London, in 1666, both he and his wife were so affected by the calamitous event, that they died of grief and terror, within twenty-four hours of each other, on the 29th of October, and were buried in the same grave. Shirley was the author of thirty-seven tragedies, comedies, &c., besides a volume of poems; which are now well known, a complete edition of his works having been published by the late Mr. Gifford.

SHORT, JAMES, a natural philosopher and eminent optician, was born at Edinburgh, in 1710; received his education at the high school and the university; and studied mathematics under Maclaurin, by whose interest he became mathematical tutor to the duke of Cumberland, and a fellow of the Royal Society. In 1739 he was employed on a survey of the Orkney islands; and on his return to London, obtained deserved celebrity for his skill in the construction of telescopes. Died, 1768.

SHORT, THOMAS, a physician and medical writer, was a native of Scotland, and was educated at Edinburgh. He settled first at Sheffield, but removed to Rotherham, where he died in 1772. He wrote a variety of works, among which were the "Natural History of Mineral and Medicinal Waters;" a "Chronological History of the Air, Weather, Seasons, Meteors," &c. 3 vols.

SHOVEL, SIR CLOUBESLEY, a gallant British admiral, was born near Clay, in Norfolk, about 1650. In 1674 he was a lieutenant under Sir John Narborough, who sent him to the dey of Tripoli with a requisition, which the latter treated with contempt. On his return he stated to the admiral the practicability of destroying the enemy's shipping, which service he performed the same night without the loss of a man. For this exploit he was appointed to the command of a ship, and he gradually rose in his profession, till he became a rear-admiral. He had a share in the victories off La Hogue and Malaga. While in command of the Mediterranean fleet in 1705, he sailed for England, and in the night of October 22d, fell by mistake upon the rocks of Scilly, where his ship was totally lost with some others, and all on board perished. His body being found by the fishermen, they stripped and buried it; but the fact becoming known, his remains were brought to London, and interred in Westminster abbey.

SHORE, JANE, the beautiful and unfortunate mistress of Edward IV., was the daughter of a London citizen, and the wife of a rich jeweller in Lombard-street. Her personal charms are represented as being transcendent; her consubial state, infelicitous; and the monarch's admiration of her, unbounded. Her virtue was not sufficiently strong to resist her royal lover, and she reluctantly yielded to his desires. She had an entire command over his heart and his purse; but she made no improper use of his munificence, her greatest happiness consisting in relieving the necessities, and in being the mistress between the sovereign and those who were under his displeasure. After the king's death she became attached to lord Hastings; and their known partiality to the young princes rendered them obnoxious to the duke of Gloucester, who accused them of witchcraft. On this charge Hastings was beheaded, and his pretended accomplice committed, by the tyrant's order, to the Tower. After undergoing the form of a mock trial, she was ordered to do penance in St. Paul's, in a white sheet, and was paraded through the public streets, the bishop of London heading the procession. Her house and fortune were seized by the protector, and the unfortunate woman was reduced to the greatest distress; but her perishing in a ditch, which is said to have given rise to Shoreditch, does not appear to be founded upon fact. Where or when she died is not known; but it is certain she was living in the reign of Henry VIII. Sir Thomas More mentions her in terms of the highest commendation; and observes, that although time and affliction had destroyed her personal charms, still she retained that softness of manners which had conspired to enslave the monarch's heart.

SHOWER, Sir BARTHOLOMEW, a celebrated lawyer, was born at Exeter, studied in the Temple, and became so eminent as a counselor, that James the Second appointed him recorder of London; but he was obliged to resign when that monarch's fears induced him to restore it. He published "Cases in Parliament resolved," &c. — His brother, JOHN, was an eminent puritan divine, and of very opposite principles to Sir Bartholomew. Being disgusted with the measures of James II. he retired to Holland until after the Revolution; and on his return he preached at the chapel in the Old Jewry. He was the author of "Reflections on Time and Eternity," "The Mourner's Companion," &c. Died, 1715.

SHUCKFORD, SAMUEL, a learned divine, who was educated at Calus college, Cambridge, and became prebendary of Canterbury, and rector of Allhallows, Lombard-street. He wrote two works, "On the Creation and Fall of Man; and "The History of the World, Sacred and Profane." Died, 1754.

SHUTER, EDWARD, a celebrated comic actor, whose talents in the delineation of humorous characters rendered him a public favourite. Died, 1776.

SIBBALD, Sir ROBERT, a physician and naturalist, born near Lealle, in Fifeshire, about 1643. He was physician and geographer to Charles II.; and contributed to the foundation of the College of Physicians at Edinburgh, of which he became the first president. Among his works are, "Scotia Illustrata;" and "The Liberty and Independence of the Kingdom and Church of Scotland." Died, 1712.

SIBTHORP, JOHN, a very learned naturalist, and regius professor of botany in the university of Oxford, was a native of that city, and received his education at Lincoln college. After studying medicine at Edinburgh, he visited France, Switzerland, and Greece, for the purpose of making botanical researches. In 1794 he published "Flora Oxoniensis;" and left an estate of 300*l.* a-year to the university, in order to defray the expense of publishing a splendid work, entitled "Flora Græca," and towards the foundation of a professorship of rural economy. Died, 1796.

SICARD, ROCH AMABROS CUCURRON, an eminent teacher of the deaf and dumb, was born in 1743, at Fousseret, near Toulouse. On the death of l'Epee, in 1789, the abbé Sicard was called to Paris, to succeed him in the direction of the establishment there. In 1793 he was arrested amidst his scholars, sent to prison, and was in imminent danger of becoming a victim in the ensuing massacre. He, however, obtained his liberty, and in 1796 joined Jauffret in compiling the "Religious, Political, and Literary Annals of France;" for which he was sentenced to transportation, but escaped. When this storm had passed away, he resumed his situation as a teacher of the deaf and dumb, which office he held for many years with great credit to himself and advantage to his pupils. He wrote several valuable works relating to tuition, &c.; and died in 1822.

SIDDONS, SARAH, the most celebrated of English tragic actresses, was a daughter of Roger Kemble, manager of an itinerant company, and born at Brecknock, in 1743. She commenced her theatrical career as a singer, but soon relinquished that line, and attempted tragedy. In her eighteenth year she was married to Mr. Siddons; when she and her husband played at Liverpool and other places, gaining both reputation and profit. In 1775 she tried her powers on the London boards, but was unsuccessful. She then obtained an engagement at Bath, where she improved rapidly, and became a general favourite. Time, with study and practice, matured her powers; and when she re-appeared at Drury-lane, in October, 1782, as "Isabella," her success was complete; and from that time forward her theatrical career was one continued triumph. In 1801 she transferred her talents to Covent-garden theatre; and in 1812, having acquired an ample fortune, she retired from the stage; appearing only once again in London, which was in 1816, for the benefit of her brother, Mr. Charles Kemble, and a few nights at Edinburgh, to assist her widowed daughter-in-law. Mrs. Siddons possessed every requisite, personal and acquired, for the high dramatic walk she had aspired to; and those who witnessed her in the meridian of her splendid career, can never forget her surpassing intellectual powers, or her unparalleled dignity of deportment. She died in 1831.

SIDNEY, Sir PHILIP, son of Sir Henry Sidney, of Penshurst, in Kent, was born in 1554, and became one of the most accomplished statesmen and writers of the age. After leaving college, he travelled in France, Germany, and Italy; and on his return, he became a favourite of queen Elizabeth, who, in 1576, sent him on an embassy to the emperor Rodolph, the real object of which was, to promote a league among the Protestant states, which he effected. In 1581, he distinguished himself in the jousts and tournaments celebrated for the entertainment of the duke of Anjou; and on the return of that prince to the continent, he accompanied him to Antwerp. The prince palatine being invested with the order of the garter in 1583, Mr. Sidney was appointed his proxy, when he received the honour of knighthood. In 1585, he projected, in concert with Sir Francis Drake, an expedition against the Spaniards in America; and he had gone to Plymouth to embark on the undertaking, when an express mandate from the queen recalled him to court. Her influence also was used to prevent him from being elected king of Poland: "refusing," as Camden says, "to further his advancement, out of fear that she should lose the jewel of her times." He was subsequently appointed governor of Flushing, and general of the cavalry under his uncle, Dudley, earl of Leicester, who commanded the forces sent to assist the Dutch against the Spaniards. On the 22d of September, 1586, he fell in with a convoy sent by the enemy to Zutphen; and though the English troops were inferior to the enemy, they gained the victory; but it was dearly purchased with the loss of their commander, who, after one horse was shot under him, mounted another, and continued the fight, till he received a ball in the left thigh, which proved fatal. As he was borne from the field, languid with the loss of blood, he asked for water, but just as the bottle was put to his lips, seeing a dying soldier looking wistfully at it, he resigned it, saying, "This man's necessity is greater than mine." He died on the 15th of October, and his body was brought to England, and interred in St. Paul's cathedral. He was the author of "A Defence of Poesy;" "Sonnets and Poems;" and the celebrated heroic romance of "Arcadia." Thus perished the gallant, amiable, and accomplished Sir Philip Sidney, in his 32d year, whose fate was the object of general regret, and whose talents and acquisitions entitle him to be recorded among the most distinguished persons of his age and nation.

SIDNEY, MARY, countess of Pembroke, was the sister of the preceding, and possessed kindred talents, which she assiduously cultivated. She wrote an "Elegy" on her lamented brother; a "Pastoral Dialogue in praise of Queen Elizabeth;" a "Discourse of Life and Death," &c. Died, 1601.

SIDNEY, ALGERNON, a celebrated English republican, second son of Robert, earl of Leicester, was born in 1617. He was carefully educated under the inspection of his father, and early trained to a military life; served with considerable distinction under his brother, lord Lisle, during the Irish rebellion; joined the parliamentarians on his return, in 1643; and, having displayed his skill and bravery in several actions, was ultimately made governor of Dover. When the high court of justice was formed for the trial of the king, he was nominated a member; and although he was neither present when sentence was pronounced, nor signed the warrant for the execution, yet he vindicated that measure; and it is supposed, therefore, that he withheld his signature at the desire of his father. The same principles, however, which led him to oppose Charles, made him hostile to the usurpation of Cromwell, during whose government he retired to Penshurst, and there occupied himself in composing his celebrated "Discourses on Government." In 1649 he was one of the commissioners sent to mediate between Denmark and Sweden; and, conscious of the offence he had given the royal party, he remained abroad till 1677, when he received a pardon, and returned. In 1663, being implicated in what was called the Rye-house plot, he was arrested, with lord William Russel and others; and when arraigned before the chief justice, Jefferies, he was found guilty, though the evidence was defective, and in every sense illegal. He was executed on Tower-hill, December 7, 1678, and suffered with characteristic firmness and constancy. One of the first acts of the Revolution was to reverse his attainder; and the name of Algernon Sidney has since been held in honour by the majority of those who maintain the fundamental principles of free government.

SIEYES, Count EMANUEL, usually called the ABBE SIEYES, was born in 1748, at Frejus, where his father was director of the post-office. Having finished his studies in the university of Paris, he was chosen one of the grand vicars to the bishop of Chartres; but at the time of the American revolution, he abandoned his ecclesiastical pursuits, to enter into the field of politics, where he boldly promulgated new doctrines, and acquired very considerable influence. He advocated the necessity and expediency of calling the tiers états in 1787, and prepared the famous "Declaration of the Rights of Man," in 1789. In the process of Louis XVI., he maintained that the Convention could not be accuser and judge. In 1790 he brought forward a project for repressing the licentiousness of the press, and voted for the establishment of civil and criminal juries. When Paine proposed to establish a republic, and invited him to publish his opinions. Sieyès replied, "that he was in favour of a monarchy, and that he preferred it because the best government was that under which the people enjoyed the most liberty; and the people were certain of more liberty under a monarchy than under a republic." When the Mountain ruled, in 1795, he declined sitting or speaking in the maimed and prostituted Convention, and occupied himself with diplomacy. From that time, he remained steady to the constitutional principles he first asserted, opposing the Jacobins, declining union with Buonaparte, though he remained a tacit member of the senate. When Napoleon returned from Elba, he protested against his mockery of a constitution, although Napoleon made him one of his peers. In 1816 he was obliged to retire from France, in consequence of the decree against the members of the Convention who voted for the death of the king in 1793, and he took up his abode in Brussels. After the revolution of 1830, he, like the other French exiles, returned to his native country; but he never re-appeared on the political scene. He died in June, 1836, aged 88. The Abbé Sieyès, during the various phases of the revolution, published numerous pamphlets, the object of which was, to consolidate a settled constitutional government, opposed at the same time to tyranny, dictatorship, and anarchy, and resting on the broadest possible base of freedom.

SIGAUD DE LAFOND, JOHN RENATUS, an eminent surgeon and natural philosopher, was born, in 1740, at Dijon, and died in 1810. He devoted himself chiefly to obstetric practice, and projected a new mode of operation in certain cases of difficult parturition. His principal works are, "Elements of Theoretical and Experimental Philosophy," and "A Dictionary of Natural Philosophy."

SIGNORELLI, LUCA, a painter, was born at Cortona, in 1459, and died in 1531. He was one of the first who designed the naked figure anatomically.

SIGONIUS, CHARLES, a learned Italian, born in 1524, at Bologna. He published the "Fasti Consulares," with an ample commentary; and wrote many esteemed works on the ancient republics, &c. Died, 1585.

SILANION, an eminent Greek sculptor, contemporary with Alexander the Great. His statues of Theseus, Achilles, Corinna, and Sappho, are among his most admired works.

SILIUS ITALICUS, CAIUS, a Roman poet, was born A.D. 15. He became a celebrated orator and advocate; rose to the dignities of consul, and proconsul in Asia; and died at his villa of Tusculum, in his 73th year. He wrote a poem in sixteen books, on the Second Punic war.

SIMEON, surnamed STYLITES, a ridiculous fanatic, born about A.D. 392, at Sison, on the borders of Syria. In the plenitude of ascetic extravagance, he adopted the strange fancy of fixing his habitation on the tops of pillars (whence his Greek appellation), and with the notion of climbing higher and higher towards heaven, removed by degrees from a pillar of six cubits high to one of forty cubits; and what is truly wonderful, he was enabled to pass forty-seven years of his wretched existence upon his pillars. Such was the extraordinary folly of the age, that this madness was regarded as a proof of holiness; and when he died, at the age of 69, his body was taken down from his last pillar by the hands of bishops, and conveyed to Antioch by an escort of 6000 soldiers, and buried with almost imperial honours.

SIMEON, surnamed METAPHRASTES, an ecclesiastical writer of the 10th century, who rose to high employments under the emperors Leo and Constantine Porphyrogenitus. He wrote the "Lives of the Saints," of which several Latin versions exist. Died, 976.

SIMEON OF DURHAM, an English historian of the 12th century, who composed a history of the Saxon and other kings, from 616 to 1130.

SIMEON, REV. CHARLES, an eminent English divine and theological writer, was born at Reading, in 1759, and was brother to the late Sir John Simeon, bart. recorder of that town, and a master of Chancery. He was educated at Eton, and entered at King's college, Cambridge, in 1776, where he made great progress in his theological studies, and received those religious impressions for which through life he was distinguished. In 1783 he was presented to the living of Trinity church, in that university, of which he continued to be the rector and officiating minister during the remainder of his life—a period of fifty-three years. His works are numerous and highly important. When they were published entire, in 1832, they consisted of twenty-one closely printed 8vo. volumes, containing 2536 sermons and skeletons of sermons, which form a commentary upon every Book of the Old and New Testament; besides various tracts and devotional treatises. When Mr. Simeon received from Mr. Cadell, the bookseller, the sum of 5000*l.* for the copyright, he appropriated 1000*l.* to the Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews; 1000*l.* to the London Clerical Education Society; and 1000*l.* to the Church Missionary Society. The death of this truly venerable pastor took place Nov. 13, 1836; and his funeral solemnities were honoured by the attendance of nearly 700 members of the university, besides as many other individuals, all of whom were dressed in deep mourning.

SIMMONS, SAMUEL FOART, a physician, was born at Sandwich, in Kent, in 1780; was educated in France, and Edinburgh; and took his degree of M.D. at Leyden. He settled in London in 1778, and the next year became a fellow of the Royal Society. In 1780 he was elected physician to the Westminster Dispensary, which situation he resigned, on his appointment to St. Luke's hospital. In 1803 he was called to attend George III., who, on his recovery, appointed him one of his physicians extraordinary. Died, 1813.

SIMON, RICHARD, an eminent French theologian, was born in 1636, at Dieppe; became professor of philosophy at the college of Jullij; and died in 1712. His "Critical History of the Old Testament" was suppressed, because it denied Moses to be the author of the Pentateuch. He also wrote various other theological and critical works.

SIMONIDES, a Grecian philosopher and poet, was born B.C. 558, in the island of Ceos, and died aged 88, at the court of Hiero, king of Syracuse. He excelled in lyric poetry and elegy.

SIMPLICIUS, a philosopher of the sixth century, was born in Cilicia. He was the disciple of Ammonius, the peripatetic, and settled at Athens, where he laboured to effect a union of the different sects, without success. Simplicius wrote Commentaries on the works of Aristotle and Epictetus.

SIMPSON, THOMAS, an eminent mathematician, was born in 1710, at Market Bosworth, in Leicestershire, and was the son of a weaver, who brought him up to his own trade, and, perceiving his inclination for reading, took away his books. He in consequence left his father, and, after many vicissitudes, one of which was his becoming a fortune-teller, he acquired a perfect knowledge of mathematics, and rose to be a mathematical professor at the Royal Academy, Woolwich, and a member of the Royal Society. He wrote Treatises on Fluxions, Annuities, and Algebra; Elements of Geometry; and other scientific works. Died, 1781.—Simpson's widow, who was allowed a pension of 200*l.* per annum, reached the extraordinary age of 102.

SIMS, Dr. JAMES, an eminent physician and botanist, was born at Canterbury; studied medicine at Edinburgh; removed to Leyden, where he took the degree of M.D. in 1764; and afterwards settled in London. He became physician to the Surrey dispensary, and also to the charity for lying-in women; devoting much of his time to, and gaining great reputation by, obstetric practice. His chief works are, "Observations on Epidemic Disorders;" "On the best Method of prosecuting Medical Inquiries;" and the "Principles and Practice of Midwifery." He was also the editor of the "Botanical Magazine," from vol. 14 to 42, and contributed to the Transactions of the Linnean Society, of which he was a member. Died, 1831.

SIMSON, ROBERT, an eminent mathematician, was born in 1687, at Kirton-hall, in Ayrshire; studied medicine at Glasgow, but never practised; was professor of mathematics at Glasgow during a period of nearly half a century; and died in 1768. Among his works are, "A Treatise on Conic Sections;" "The Loca Plani of Apollonius restored," &c.

SINCLAIR, or SINCLARE, GEORGE, professor of philosophy at Glasgow during the period of the Commonwealth and Cromwell's usurpation. Being a zealous Presbyterian he lost his situation at the Restoration, but was restored to it on the accession of William III. He was distinguished for his researches in philosophical science; was an able engineer; and published treatises on hydrostatics and other branches of the mathematics. He was also the author of a book, entitled "Satan's Invisible World discovered," which was for a long time popular among the Scottish peasantry. Died, 1696.

SINCLAIR, CHARLES GIDEON, baron, a distinguished Swedish general, and writer on military tactics. He was engaged, in the service of various governments, in different parts of Europe during the wars of the last century; and published "Military Institutions," 3 vols., &c. Died, 1803.

SINCLAIR, Sir JOHN, bart., an active and enlightened philanthropist, was born at Thurso Castle, in the county of Caithness, in 1754. He received his education chiefly at the High School, Edinburgh, but subsequently attended the universities of Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Oxford. In 1775 he was admitted a member of the Faculty of Advocates, and was afterwards called to the English bar. In 1780 he was elected member for the county of Caithness, which he also represented in the parliaments of 1790, 1802, and 1807; and sat for the borough of Lostwithiel in 1784, and for Petersfield in 1796. For more than half a century Sir John Sinclair occupied a prominent station in public life; and there was scarcely any topic in the whole range of political, statistical, or medical science, which had not engaged his active and enquiring mind. His reputation as a patron and promoter of agricultural improvement, in particular, was not confined to Britain, nor even to Europe; the most eminent political economists in America had appreciated and eulogised his valuable labours. He was the originator of the Board of Agriculture, which he established in 1793; and he also procured the establishment of a society, in Scotland, for the improvement of wool;—of both these he was the president. Nor were his patriotic exertions in defence of his country less conspicuous than his endeavours to improve its moral and statistical condition. He raised two battalions of 1000 men each, in the counties of Ross and Caithness, which were the first fencible regiments whose services were extended beyond Scotland. To a disposition as truly patriotic and philanthropic as ever warmed a human breast, he added an unflinching perseverance, which he evinced not merely by his support of all public institutions that had for their object the amelioration of mankind, but by advocating every useful public measure by his pen. To enumerate the whole of his literary productions here, would be perfectly incompatible with our limits; for during upwards of sixty years they were incessantly issuing from the press. The "Plans," "Proposals," "Hints," "Observations," &c. of Sir John Sinclair, were promulgated unceasingly; and, though many of them possessed only a local interest, they were not the less useful or meritorious. His principal works consist of a "History of the Revenue of Great Britain," 3 vols.; a "Statistical Account of Scotland," a work of unexampled labour; "Thoughts on the Naval Strength of Great Britain;" "Considerations on Militia and Standing Armies;" "Essays on Agriculture;" "The Code of Health and Longevity;" "An Account of the Northern Districts of Scotland;" papers on the "Bullion" question; and his publication of the originals of the Oseanic Poems, with a Dissertation. It is said that at the time of his death he had made a considerable progress in a "Political Code," and a "Code of Religion." Died, Dec. 21, 1835.

SINDIAH, or SCINDIA, MAHADJEE, a bold and ambitious Mahratta prince, was born in Hindostan, about 1741. He was the son of a Mahratta officer at the court of the pelshaw, and was at the battle of Paniput in 1761, where he was wounded and taken prisoner; but made his escape, and took refuge in the Deccan. In 1770 he invaded Hindostan in concert with Holkar, and made himself master of Delhi; he also took Agra, where he established a cannon-foundry, and was the first Indian prince whose troops were armed and disciplined after the manner of Europeans. He was greatly indebted to the talents of Leborgne de Bolgne, a French general whom he had taken into his service, and who commanded the army which gained the famous battle of Patan, in 1790. He possessed an extensive territory, and was engaged in schemes of farther aggrandizement at the time of his death, which happened in 1794. His nephew, Dowla Rao Sindia, succeeded him.

SIRI, VICTOR, an Italian monk and annalist, was born at Parma, in 1613. He published a political journal, under the name of "Memorie Recondite;" which induced Mazzarin to invite him to France, where he obtained an abbey, and was appointed almoner and historiographer to the king. Died, 1683.

SIRMOND, JAMES, a learned French Jesuit, was born at Riom, in 1559. For several years he taught in the college at Paris; but, in 1590, Aquaviva, the general of his order, called him to Rome, and made him his secretary. On his return to Paris, he devoted himself to literary researches, and published the works of several writers in the middle ages, particularly Sidonius Apollinarius. He died in 1651, aged 92.

SIX, JOHN, a Dutch dramatic poet, was born in 1618, and died in 1700. The works of Six are remarkable for purity of style. He was the friend and patron of Rembrandt, and his portrait was engraved by that artist.

SIXTUS V., pope, FELIX PERETTI, the son of a vine-dresser, was born in 1521, at Montalto, in the marquisate of Ancona, and in his early youth was employed in keeping swine. Having obtained admission, as a lay-brother, in the convent of Ascoli, and being afterwards ordained priest, he acquired great popularity by his preaching, and rose, successively, to be commissary-general at Bologna, and inquisitor at Venice, general of his order, bishop of St. Agatha, and a cardinal. On the elevation of Gregory XIII. to the papal chair, he assumed a character of meekness and humility, and took no part in political contentions. He even feigned to be bowed down with age and infirmities; and when pope Gregory died, the interest of the more influential candidates being nearly equal, they agreed to choose Montalto for the present, who appeared incessantly coughing and at the very threshold of death. But no sooner had the tiara been placed on his head than he threw away his staff, and chanted Te Deum with a voice so strong, that the roof of the chapel echoed with the sound. He held the papal chair only five years; during which period he undertook numerous magnificent works, governed with firmness and talent, and left a large sum in his treasury.

SKELTON, JOHN, an old English poet, was born, towards the close of the 15th century, in Cumberland; was educated at Oxford; was made poet laureat, and obtained the living of Diss, in Norfolk. He was a coarse and caustic satirist, and was obliged to take refuge in the sanctuary of Westminster, in consequence of his satires on Wolsey and the mendicant friars. Died, 1529.

SKELTON, PHILIP, an eminent Irish divine of exemplary character, was born in 1707, and was educated at Trinity college, Dublin. In 1732 he settled on the curacy of Monaghan, in the diocese of Clogher, with a salary of forty pounds a-year; out of which he allowed ten to his mother, and ten for the payment of his debts. While in this situation, he published some tracts, one of which, entitled "Proposals for the revival of Christianity," was attributed to Swift. His other works are, "Deism Revealed," 2 vols.; and "Sermons," 3 vols. Died, 1787.

SKINNER, STEPHEN, a philologist, was born in London, about 1622; was educated at Christ-church, Oxford; settled as a physician at Lincoln; and died in 1667. He was author of "Etymologicon Lingue Anglicane."

SLEIDAN, JOHN PHILIPPO, an eminent German historian, was born, in 1506, at Schleide, near Cologne, and completed his studies at the universities of Paris and Orleans. For many years he was confidential secretary to cardinal du Bellay; but on espousing the doctrines of the Reformation, he settled at Strasburgh, and was employed in various negotiations. Of his works the most important are, "A History of the Reformation;" and "A History of the Four Ancient Monarchies." Died, 1556.

SLOANE, Sir HANS, a distinguished physician and naturalist, was born at Killisnoagh, Ireland, in 1660, and studied medicine in London, where he settled. He was the first in England who introduced into general practice the use of bark, not only in fevers, but in a variety of other disorders. He also formed a valuable museum of the rarest productions of nature and art, which, together with his library, consisting of upwards of 50,000 volumes, and 3500 manuscripts, were purchased of his executors for 20,000*l.* by act of parliament, and made part of the collection of the British Museum. George I. created him a baronet, in 1716, and he was appointed physician-general to the army; on the accession of George II., he was named physician in ordinary to his majesty; and in 1737 he became president of the Royal Society, of which he had previously been secretary. Died, 1752.

SLDITZ, RENÉ MICHAEL, surnamed Michael Angelo, a sculptor, was born in Paris in 1703, and died in 1764. One of his greatest works is the monument of Lauguet in the church of St. Sulpice.

SMALRIDGE, Dr. GEORGE, bishop of Bristol; an able and elegant theological writer. Born, 1666; died, 1719.

SMART, CHRISTOPHER, an English poet, born in 1722, at Shipbourne, in Kent, was educated at Pembroke college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, but vacated it by marriage, and having settled in London commenced author. The gaiety of his disposition, and the buoyancy of his spirits, rendered him an acceptable companion to the wits and public writers of the day, with many of whom, particularly Pope, Johnson, Garrick, and Hawkesworth he became intimate. He translated Pope's "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day," and the "Essay on Criticism," into elegant Latin verse; wrote a poetical version of the Psalms; a volume of original poems; "Hannah," an oratorio; with several odes, fables, &c. He also gave to the world, translations of the works of Horace, both in prose and verse. Poverty, however, overtook him; and his distresses, aided by intemperance, so unsettled his intellects, that he was placed for awhile under personal restraint. His "Song to David," written in a madhouse, and partly with charcoal, on the walls of his cell, bears a melancholy attestation to the strength of his mental powers, even in their derangement. He died, within the rules of the King's Bench prison, in 1771.

SMEATON, JOHN, an eminent civil engineer, was born in 1724, at Austhorpe, near Leeds. His father, who was an attorney, was desirous of bringing up his son to the same profession; but finding that the law was not suited to his taste, he wisely permitted him to follow the impulse of his genius, and he became a mathematical instrument maker. In 1759 he received the gold medal of the Royal Society, of which he was a member, for a paper on the power of wind and water to turn mills; and as an engineer, he gradually rose to the summit of his profession. In 1755, the Eddystone lighthouse was burnt down, and Mr. Smeaton being recommended to the proprietors of that building as an engineer in every way calculated to rebuild it, he undertook the work, and executed it in such a manner, as almost to bid defiance to the power of time, or accident. His last public employment was that of engineer for the improvement of Ramsgate harbour. Died, 1792.

SMELLIE, WILLIAM, a Scotch surgeon and physician, who distinguished himself as a lecturer and practitioner in midwifery in London, died in 1763. He wrote a "Complete System of Midwifery," and published a set of "Anatomical Tables, with Explanations."

SMELLIE, WILLIAM, a printer at Edinburgh, distinguished also as a man of science and learning, was born in 1740. He was the translator of Buffon's Natural History, and author of the "Philosophy of Natural History," and of many other ingenious works. He was a fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and was much esteemed among the literati of his native city, where he died in 1796.

SMITH, Sir THOMAS, a learned English statesman, historian, and critic, was born in 1747, at Saffron Waldon, in Essex; and after having been Greek professor and university orator at Cambridge, became secretary of state in the reigns of Edward VI. and Elizabeth. Born, 1519; died, 1577. His "Commonwealth of England," is the book by which he is best known.

SMITH, Sir JOHN, son of Sir Clement Smith, of Little Baddow, in Essex, was educated at Oxford, and distinguished himself as a soldier and a statesman. In 1576 he was sent by queen Elizabeth to intercede with the king of Spain on behalf of the states of the Netherlands; and for his conduct in this mission he received the honour of knighthood. Died, 1600.

SMITH, MILLS, a learned bishop, was born at Hereford, in 1565. He was well acquainted with the Oriental languages, and was one of the principal persons engaged in the translation of the Bible, to which he wrote the preface. Died, 1634.

SMITH, JOHN, an English adventurer, was born at Willoughby, in Lincolnshire. In the wars of Hungary, about 1682, he served against the Turks with such valour, that Sigismund, duke of Transylvania, gave him his picture set in gold, and a pension. After this he went to America, and contributed to the settlement of New England and Virginia. Died, 1631. He wrote "A History of Virginia, New England, and the Summer Isles;" "Travels in Europe," &c.

SMITH, JOHN, a physician, born in 1638, practised in London, and was a fellow of the College of Physicians. He was the author of a clever treatise, called "The Portrait of Old Age," being a paraphrase of part of the twelfth chapter of Ecclesiastes. Died, 1679.

SMITH, Dr. THOMAS, a learned English divine, historian, biographer, and critic; born in London, in 1638; died, 1710. He wrote numerous works, among which is one "On the Credibility of the Mysteries of the Christian Religion."

SMITH, JOHN, an English divine, particularly versed in northern literature and in antiquities; born, 1639; died 1715. He published an edition of the historical works of Venerable Bede.—His son, GEORGE, who was born at Durham, in 1693, was the author of a book, entitled "Britons and Saxons not converted to Popery." Died, 1736.

SMITH, ROBERT, a divine and mathematician, born in 1689, was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became master on the death of Dr. Bentley; and was mathematical preceptor to the duke of Cumberland. He wrote "A System of Optics," 2 vols. 4to.; and "Harmonica, or the Philosophy of Musical Sounds." Died, 1764.

SMITH, GEORGE, a painter, was born at Chichester, in 1714. He excelled in landscape, and some of his pieces gained prizes from the Society of Arts. Died, 1776.

SMITH, ADAM, a celebrated writer on morals, and political economy, was born at Kirkcaldy, in Scotland, in 1723. He received his education first at Kirkaldy school, and afterwards at the university of Glasgow, where he became professor of logic and moral philosophy, and took his degree of doctor of laws. In 1759, by the publication of his "Theory of Moral Sentiments" he acquired a reputation which was greatly heightened and extended by his "Enquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations," which soon became a standard work in Europe, and may be considered the precursor of the modern science of political economy. Dr. Smith was the intimate friend of Hume, and published an "Apology for his Life," which was severely animadverted on by Dr. Horne for advocating sentiments and opinions that, in a religious point of view, were wholly indefensible. Died, 1790.

SMITH, CHARLOTTE, a novelist and poet, whose maiden name was Turner, was born in Sussex, in 1749. At the age of sixteen she married a West India merchant, who was subsequently ruined; and her pen, which she had used before merely for her amusement, now became the support of her husband and family. Her first production was entitled "Elegiac Sonnets and other Essays." After this, she published "The Romance of real Life;" the novels of "Emmeline," "Marchmont," "Desmond," "Ethelinda," "Celestine," and "The Old Manor House;" besides several poems, and tales for youth; all of which were well received. Died, 1806.

SMITH, ELIZABETH, a young lady of extraordinary accomplishments, the daughter of a gentleman residing at Burnhall, near Durham, was born in 1776. According to Miss Bowdler's memoir of her, she possessed a knowledge of the mathematics, and an exquisite taste for drawing and poetry; understood the French, Italian, Spanish, and German languages; made herself acquainted with the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, and Persian; and was thoroughly versed in biblical literature. She died of a consumption, in 1806. Her translations of the book of Job, and the Life of Kiopstock, were published.

SMITH, SIR JAMES EDWARD, an eminent English physician and naturalist, was born at Norwich, in 1759; studied medicine at Edinburgh, and took his degree at Leyden, in 1786; visited France and Italy; and, on his return to England, published "A Sketch of a Tour on the Continent," 3 vols., in which there is much information on subjects of natural history. He established the Linnean Society, and was its first president; received the honour of knighthood from George IV., and died in 1828, at his native city, where he had long practised as a physician. Besides his "Tour" before mentioned, he wrote a "Natural History of the Lepidopterous Insects of Georgia," 2 vols. folio; "English Botany," 38 vols. 8vo.; "Flora Botanica," 3 vols. 8vo.; the "English Flora," 4 vols. 8vo.; and an "Introduction to Botany."

SMITH, WILLIAM, who for forty-six years was a member of the House of Commons, and the leading advocate of the Dissenting interest, first entered Parliament in 1784, as M.P. for Sudbury, and in 1802 was returned for Norwich. From the commencement of his senatorial career he was the consistent supporter of liberal measures, and the advocate of all reforms calculated to promote the happiness of the human race. Died, 1835, aged 79.

SMITH, SIR WILLIAM COSACK, an eminent Irish judge, son of Sir Michael Smith, the first baronet, and Master of the Rolls in Ireland, was born in 1766. He entered as a gentleman commoner of Christchurch, Oxford, in 1784, and during his university course he spent his vacations at the house of his friend, the celebrated Edmund Burke. He was called to the Irish bar in 1788; admitted as an advocate in the spiritual courts; obtained the rank of king's counsel, in 1795; was appointed solicitor-general for Ireland, in 1800; and succeeded his father, as a baron of the Exchequer, in 1802. His decisions were distinguished for clearness, vigour, and promptitude; as an orator he was chaste and graceful; in legal research he was unexcelled by any of his contemporaries; and his humanity was still more conspicuous than his judicial ability. Throughout his life he was the consistent advocate of Catholic emancipation, and leaned to the constitutional politics of the old Whig school; but no sooner had he warned the country against the revolutionary measures of the Repealers, in some of his luminous charges to the grand juries, than he was assailed by them with every virulent epithet that malice could suggest. He died in August, 1836; having done honour to his native land, not only as a great legal luminary, during nearly half a century, but as a political and philosophical writer, and as a truly conscientious man.

SMOLLETT, TOBIAS, a writer of varied talents and considerable note, was born at Dalquhurn, in Dumbartonshire, in 1721; was apprenticed to a surgeon at Glasgow, and became surgeon's mate in a man-of-war; but quitted the service in 1746, and, settling in London, commenced his career as an author. The tragedy of "The Regicide," the "Tears of Scotland," a spirited poem, and "Advice," and "Reproof," two satires, were his first productions. In 1748 his novel of "Roderick Random" appeared, which at once rendered him popular; and it was followed, at intervals, by "Peregrine Pickle," "Count Fathom," a translation of "Don Quixote," "Sir Launcelot Greaves," the "Adventures of an Atom," "Humfrey Clinker," a "Continuation of Hume's History of England," and "Travels through France and Italy." In 1756 he established "The Critical Review;" for a libel in which, upon admiral Knowles, he suffered fine and imprisonment. When lord Bute came into power, Smollett was engaged to support him in a weekly paper, called "The Briton," which soon had a formidable opponent in the "North Briton" of Wilkes, and was unable long to maintain its ground. As a novelist, Dr. Smollett exhibits considerable originality, with much knowledge of life and manners, and an exuberance of humour, but he is open to the charge of indelicacy: as a poet, he appears to considerable advantage in his "Tears of Scotland," and the "Ode to Independence," but as a satirist he is coarse and virulent. He died while on his travels, near Leghorn, in 1771.

SMYTH, JAMES CARMICHAEL, F.R.S., an eminent physician, was born in Scotland, in 1741; studied medicine at Edinburgh and Leyden; and obtained a situation in the medical department of the army. While he was at Winchester, in 1780, in charge of the French prison hospital, he discovered a mode of preventing and destroying contagion by the use of nitrous vapour, for which he was remunerated by parliament in 1802. On this and other medical subjects he wrote several pamphlets; and also published an edition of Dr. Sark's works. Died, 1821.

SNELL, RODOLPH, an eminent mathematician and philosophical writer, was born at Oudewarde, in Holland, in 1547. He became professor of mathematics, and afterwards of Hebrew, in the university of Leyden, where he died in 1613. He published "Apollonius Batavius," and several treatises on the works of Ramus.—His son, WILLEBROD SNELL, born at Leyden, in 1591, succeeded his father in the mathematical chair, and died in 1686. He discovered the law of the refraction of the rays of light; and undertook the measurement of the earth, or a degree of the meridian, which Mosechenbroek afterwards corrected. He published some of the works of the ancient mathematicians, and a few learned treatises of his own on mathematical subjects.

SNYDERS, FRANCIS, a celebrated painter of the Flemish school, born at Antwerp, in 1579. He studied under Henry Van Balen; and after visiting Italy for improvement, settled at Brussels, under the patronage of the archduke Ferdinand. His battles and hunting pieces are admirable, and in the representation of animals none have ever surpassed him. Died, 1657.

SOANE, Sir JOHN, an eminent architect, was born at Reading, in Berkshire, in 1752; came to London at an early age, with his father, who was a builder; was placed with Mr. Dance, the celebrated architect, when about fifteen, and afterwards acquired more practical experience in the art under Mr. Holland. In 1772, being a student of the Royal Academy, he was awarded the silver medal for the best drawing of the Banqueting House, Whitehall. Four years afterwards he obtained the gold medal for the best design for a triumphal bridge. Soon after this, he was introduced to George III. by Sir W. Chambers, and was sent to pursue his studies at Rome, with the customary academy pension of 60*l.* per annum, for three years, and the same amount for travelling expenses out and home. Here he continued until the summer of 1780, and during his sojourn in Italy he studied most assiduously the grand remains of ancient art. On his return to England, he was employed on many public works, as well as private buildings; and on the death of Sir Robert Taylor, in 1786, he was appointed architect and surveyor to the Bank of England, but not without a severe competition, in which there were thirteen candidates. To this success is attributable the superstructure of his subsequent fortunes. In 1791 he was appointed clerk of the works to St. James's Palace, the Parliament Houses, and other public buildings; and in 1793 he was nominated architect of the Royal Woods and Forests; both of which offices he some years after resigned. In 1794, a committee of the House of Lords directed him to consider what alterations could properly be made to render the House, offices, &c., more convenient and commodious. He accordingly made all the requisite surveys, plans, elevations, &c., in which was first introduced the noble idea of enriching the Hall of Rufus, the Court of Requests, and the Painted Chamber, with painting and sculpture, to commemorate great public actions and distinguished talent; but though his designs were fully sanctioned and approved of by the king, the execution of the work fell to the lot of the late Mr. James Wyatt. In 1806 he was elected professor of architecture to the Royal Academy. At this period, and for many years after, Mr. Soane was most actively engaged in erecting or improving numerous public edifices in the metropolis and elsewhere. Among these may be mentioned the Dulwich Gallery, the National Debt Redemption Office in the Old Jewry, the new Law Courts, &c. &c. In 1821 he made a magnificent design for a new palace, to be constructed on Constitution-hill; but Buckingham-house was unfortunately preferred. In 1824, he was elected architect to the Royal College of Surgeons, and a member of the Royal Society. In 1826 he built the present Freemason's Hall, in Queen-street, and gave 500*l.* towards the expense of its erection; having been chosen grand superintendent of works to the fraternity of freemasons some years before. He subscribed 1000*l.* towards erecting the monument to his royal highness the duke of York, and presented 500*l.* to the Royal British Institution, Pall-mall. In 1833 he completed the new State Paper Office in St. James's Park. This was the last of his professional works; and, having passed his 80th year, he retired from a profession in which he had been engaged sixty years, and tendered his resignation to the governor and directors of the Bank of England, in whose service he had been for forty-five years. He then set seriously about the idea he had long formed of bequeathing his large and valuable collection of works of ancient and modern art, (valued at upwards of 50,000*l.*), in perpetuity to the nation, for the benefit of students in the arts, and especially for the advancement of architectural knowledge. This he lived to see completed by act of parliament; and at his death, which occurred Jan. 20, 1837, his splendid house and museum in Lincoln's Inn Fields, became the property of the public. An unhappy difference had for many years subsisted between Sir John Soane and Mr. George Soane, his son. We have understood that it originated in the latter having criticized, with unbecoming levity, some of his father's performances; but whatever might have been the offence, it is to be sincerely regretted that to all appeals on behalf of his son, Sir John for ever remained inexorable. We would gladly have avoided referring to this domestic schism; and indeed, we had hoped that some humane arrangement had since taken place, by which a notice of it here might have been omitted, as irrelevant; but it has become a subject of public notoriety; for at the very time we are preparing this biographical sketch, (Feb. 1838) the following paragraph appears in the parliamentary news of the day: "Mr. Clay presented a petition from the family of the late Sir John Soane, praying for leave to bring in a bill so far to amend the act of 1833, as to allow a portion of the money appropriated for the maintenance of the museum, to be applied to the support of the family of Sir J. Soane's son, who are at present in a state of destitution." Yet Sir John Soane died worth the sum of 200,000l.!

SOBIESKI, JOHN III., king of Poland, surnamed the Great for his military genius and warlike exploits, was born in 1629, of an illustrious family, at the castle of Olecko, in Poland. In spite of the enormous disparity of numbers with which he had to contend in the Polish wars, from 1648 to 1674, he was often eminently successful. After coming to the throne, in 1674, he led his troops to fresh victories: overrunning Moldavia and Wallachia; and crowning all his former brilliant exploits by raising the siege of Vienna, in 1683; whereby Europe was saved from the dreadful calamities to be apprehended from an irruption of the Ottoman forces. Died, 1696.

SOCINUS, LÆLIUS, an Italian sectary, was born at Sienna, in 1525; studied at Bologna; and in 1546 became member of a secret society formed in the territory of Venice, on the principle of free inquiry. This institution being soon broken up, Socinus quitted Italy to join the reformers in Switzerland; and died, at Zurich, in 1562.

SOCINUS, FAUSTUS, nephew of the preceding, was born at Sienna, in 1539. Having imbibed the opinions of his uncle, he propagated them with such zeal, as to become the founder of a sect called by his name. He resided some years at the court of Florence, where he held a civil employment; but in 1574 he went to Germany, and next to Poland, where he strenuously laboured to reconcile the differences existing between the Unitarian churches. The tenets of Socinus differed but little from Arianism; by rejecting the divine nature of Christ altogether, and regarding his mission as merely designed to introduce a new moral law. He died in 1604.

SOCRATES, the most eminent of the Grecian philosophers, and the one who is handed down to us as a model of wisdom and virtue, was born in Attica, B.C. 470. His father was a statuary, in which employment Socrates was brought up; but the cultivation of his mind was the object nearest his heart, and to that his attention was unremittingly devoted. He attended the lectures of the most celebrated philosophers of his time; and studied the principles of eloquence, poetry, music, and the mathematical sciences. But the moral improvement of his fellow men was the end and aim of all his studies and all his exertions. His method of teaching was by proposing to his hearers a series of questions in such a manner as to produce in their minds a conviction of the truth of the proposition originally advanced; a mode of argument ever since termed Socratic. He maintained the existence of one Supreme Intelligence, whose providence is over all his works; and he was equally clear in the existence of a future state. His system of morals corresponded with these principles; and his invariable maxim was, that virtue and wisdom are inseparable. Socrates, however, while he taught these truths, and exhibited in his own conduct all the temperance, forbearance, and self-command, which principally constitute elevation of character, could not altogether divest himself of the superstitious notions of his times. He affirmed, that an invisible genius constantly attended upon his own person, warning him of danger, and directing him in the course of life he should pursue. As a citizen, he discharged, with exemplary faithfulness, all his public duties. Three times he served in the army of his country, excelling his fellow soldiers in the ease with which he endured the hardships of their campaigns. The last part of his life occurred during that unhappy period when Athens had sunk into anarchy and despotism, in consequence of the unfortunate result of the Peloponnesian war. Amid the general immorality, hatred, envy, and malice of such an epoch, Socrates was charged, by the infamous Melitus and Anytus, with introducing new gods, of denying the ancient divinities of the state, and of corrupting youth, &c. He defended himself with the calm confidence of innocence; but was condemned by a majority of three voices, and sentenced to drink poison. Xenophon describes the scene with much affecting simplicity. When the cup of hemlock was presented to him, he received it with a steady hand; and after a prayer to the gods for a favourable passage to the invisible world, he serenely swallowed the fatal draught. Thus perished, in his 70th year (B.C. 400), a man whom all heathen antiquity has pronounced the wisest and most virtuous of mortals. Party enmity for a while pursued his memory; but at length the Athenians became sensible of their injustice, put to death or banished his accusers, recalled his friends, and erected a statue to his memory.

SOCRATES, an ecclesiastical historian of the fifth century. He was born at Constantinople, and bred to the bar, whence he obtained the name of SCHOLASTICUS. He wrote the History of the Church, from the period where that of Eusebius terminates, to the year 449.

SOLANDER, DANIEL CHARLES, a naturalist, was born in Sweden, in 1735; studied at Upsal, where he became a pupil of Linnæus, and took his degree of M.D. In 1760 he came to England; obtained an employment in the British Museum; and was elected a member of the Royal Society. In 1768 he accompanied Mr. Banks (afterwards Sir Joseph) in his voyage round the world, with Captain Cook; and he was subsequently employed in arranging and describing the valuable botanical collections which were the result of their researches. He was created D.C.L. at Oxford, in 1771; was made one of the assistant librarians at the British Museum, in 1773; and died in 1792.

SOLE, ANTONIO, a landscape painter, was born at Bologna, in 1697, and died there in 1777.

SOLIGNAC, PETER JOSEPH, chevalier de, was born at Montpellier, in 1687. He was secretary to Stanislaus, king of Poland, and wrote a history of that country, 5 vols. Died, 1773.

SOLIMENE, FRANCIS, a painter and poet, born at Naples, in 1637, and died in 1747. Philip V. sat to him for his portrait; and the emperor Charles VI. conferred on him the honour of knighthood.

SOLINUS, CAIUS JULIUS, a grammarian in the third century. He compiled from the natural history of Pliny a collection, entitled "Polyhistor," an edition of which was published by Salmassius.

SOLIS, ANTONIO DE, a Spanish poet and historian, was born at Piacenza, in Old Castile, in 1610; was appointed historiographer of the Indies; and wrote the "History of the Conquest of Mexico." His other works consist of dramas, poems, and letters. At the latter part of his life, De Solis entered into orders; and died in 1686.

OLON, one of the seven sages of Greece, and the celebrated legislator of Athens, was born at Salamis, in the sixth century B.C. Inheriting but a small patrimony, he had recourse to commerce; but at the same time he applied himself in the study of moral and political wisdom, and soon became distinguished by his superior knowledge in state affairs. After having enhanced the glory of his country, by recovering Salamis, he refused the sovereignty of Athens; but being chosen archon by acclamation, B.C. 584, he set himself down to the task of improving the condition of his countrymen. He abolished most of the cruel laws of Draco, and formed a new constitution, founded on the principle that the supreme power resided in the people. When Solon had completed his laws, he caused them to be engraved on wooden cylinders, and bound the Athenians by an oath not to make any changes in his code for ten years. He then left the country, to avoid being obliged to make any alterations in them; and visited Egypt, Cyprus, and Lydia. On his return, after an absence of ten years, he found the state torn by party violence, and his kinsman Pisistratus aiming at the sovereignty. He then withdrew from Athens, and is supposed to have died at Cyprus, aged 80.

SOLVYNS, FRANCIS BALTHASAR, an able artist, born at Antwerp, in 1760. He accompanied Sir Home Popham in a voyage to the Red Sea and the East Indies; and having arrived at Hindostan, he studied the languages, manners, customs, and religion of the Hindoos, that he might be able accurately to illustrate them by his pen and pencil. After an absence of fifteen years, he returned to Europe, settled at Paris, and published, as the result of his labours, "Les Hindous, ou Description pittoresque des Mœurs, Costumes, et Cérémonies Religieuses de ce Peuple," 4 vols. folio. He died at Antwerp, in 1824.

SOMBREUIL, CHARLES VEROT DE, a French royalist officer, who, at the commencement of the Revolution, distinguished himself by his courageous defence of the monarchy. He afterwards served in the emigrant armies; and having the command of part of the forces in the unfortunate expedition to Quiberon, in 1794, was taken prisoner, tried before a military commission, and shot.

SOMERS, JOHN, lord, a distinguished statesman and lawyer, was born at Worcester, in 1632. He passed some time as clerk to a barrister, and, when called to the bar himself, evinced talents of a high order. He made himself conspicuous by his opposition to the measures of Charles II. and James II.; and acquired great credit as one of the counsel for the seven bishops. He strenuously promoted the Revolution, and sat, as one of the representatives for Worcester, in the convention parliament. He became, successively, solicitor-general, attorney-general, lord keeper, and in 1695, lord high chancellor of England, with the title of lord Somers, baron Evesham. After the death of William III., lord Somers spent his time in literary retirement, and was chosen president of the Royal Society. In 1706 he drew up a plan for effecting an union between England and Scotland, which was so much approved, that queen Anne appointed him one of the commissioners to carry it into execution. Upon a change of ministry, in 1708, he was nominated president of the council. He died in 1716; having earned a high character for political parity and legal ability. He was also deservedly esteemed as a patron of men of letters.

SOMERVILLE, WILLIAM, the author of "The Chase," and other poems, was born at Edston, in Warwickshire, in 1692, where he inherited a considerable paternal estate, on which he chiefly lived, mingling an ardent attachment to the sports of the field with the studies of a man of letters. Died, 1742.

SOMNER, WILLIAM, a learned antiquarian, was born at Canterbury, in 1606. He was the author of "The Antiquities of Canterbury;" a "Saxon Dictionary;" and a "Treatise on Gavelkind." Died, 1699.

SONNERAT, PETER, a naturalist and traveller, was born at Lyons, about 1744. After making several voyages to the East Indies, Malacca, the Philippine Islands, &c., he returned to France with a rich collection of natural curiosities; wrote narratives of his voyages to New Guinea, the East Indies, and China; and died in 1814.

SONNINI DE MANONCOURT, CHAS. NICHOLAS SIOBERT, an eminent French traveller and naturalist, was born at Lunéville, in 1731; studied the law, which he relinquished for the military profession; and being sent to Cayenne as an officer of marine engineers, he was enabled at the same time to gratify his love of travelling and taste for natural history. He assisted Buffon in his account of foreign birds; visited different parts of the European and African continents; and employed himself in various scientific researches till the commencement of the Revolution, when he narrowly escaped from the tyranny of Robespierre. Under the consular and imperial governments he was unable to obtain any employment, in consequence of the prejudices entertained against him by Buonaparte for his remarks on the Egyptian expedition. Among the works of Sonni are, "Travels in Egypt;" "Travels in Greece and Turkey;" and an edition, in 177 vols. 8vo. of "Buffon's Natural History." He also assisted in the "Dictionnaire d'Histoire Naturelle," 24 vols. 8vo; and was conductor of the "Bibliothèque Physico-economique." Died, 1811.

SOPHOCLES, a celebrated tragic poet, who carried the Greek drama to perfection, was born at Athens, about 496 a.c. In his ninety-fifth year, he is said to have expired from excessive joy, in consequence of the unexpected success of one of his dramas at the Olympic games. Of his numerous plays, only seven have reached modern times; but they are sufficiently meritorious to establish his fame.

SORBONNE, ROBERT DE, founder of the college of that name at Paris, was born in 1201. He was confessor and chaplain to St. Louis, who gave him the canonry of Cambray. He died in 1274.

SOSIGENES, an astronomer of Egypt, who was invited to Rome by Julius Cæsar, for the reformation of the calendar. He fixed the year at 365 days, called the Julian year, which commenced a.c. 45. No farther particulars respecting him are known, nor are any of his works extant.

SOSTRATUS, an eminent architect who flourished in the third century a.c. and was patronized by Philadelphus, king of Egypt. Among his works was the famous Pharos, or light-house of Alexandria, which is said to have cost 800 talents, and was reckoned one of the wonders of the world.

SOUFFLOT, JAMES GERMAIN, an eminent French architect, born in 1713. He studied at Rome; and after travelling in Italy and the Levant, to examine the remains of antiquity, he settled at Lyons, where he built an exchange and hospital, which gained him so much credit, that he was called to Paris, and made superintendent of the royal buildings. His principal work is the church of St. Genevieve. He was a knight of the order of St. Michael; and died in 1780.

SOUTH, ROBERT, an eminent divine, was born at Hackney, in 1633; and educated at Westminster-school and Christ-church, Oxford. In 1660 he was chosen public orator of the university, and successively became chaplain to the earl of Clarendon, prebendary of Westminster, canon of Christ-church, and rector of Islip, in Oxfordshire. In 1693 he carried on a controversy with Sherlock, on the doctrine of the Trinity, when both disputants were charged with heresy, for attempting to explain an indefinable mystery. He was a man of great wit, and did not spare to display it even on serious occasions. His "Sermons" possess the merit of earnestness and originality. Died, 1716.

SOUTHCOTT, JOANNA, an ignorant female fanatic, was born in the west of England, of parents in humble life, in 1750. When about forty years of age she assumed the airs of a prophetess; and her numerous converts, who are said at one time to have amounted to at least 100,000, put implicit faith in her wild and blasphemous rhapsodies. She described herself as the woman spoken of in the book of Revelations; and, although in the highest degree illiterate, she scribbled a mass of unintelligible nonsense, which she dignified by the title of prophetic inspirations, while she carried on a lucrative trade in the sale of seals, which were, under certain conditions, to be the passports to eternal salvation. At length, after having passed her grand climacteric, she was attacked with a disease which had the outward appearance of pregnancy, and she boldly announced to the world that she was destined to be the mother of the promised Shiloh; so fully persuaded, indeed, were her deluded followers of its truth, that they made the most splendid preparations for the reception of the miraculous babe that superstition and credulity could suggest; when, about the end of 1814, her death put an end to their expectations. The body of Joanna underwent an anatomical examination after her death, when the extraordinary appearance of her shape was fully accounted for on medical principles; but the belief in her divine mission was not eradicated from the minds of her votaries, and the sect is not even yet wholly extinct.

SOUTHERN, THOMAS, an eminent dramatic poet of the age of Charles II. was born at Dublin, in 1660; became a survivor in Pembroke college, Oxford; and then settled in London. He wrote the "Persian Prince;" "Isabella, or the Fatal Marriage;" and "Oroonoko," tragedies; the "Disappointment;" the "Rambling Lady;" and the Wives' Excuse," comedies. His tragedy of "Isabella" is one of the most pathetic and effective dramas in the language. He held a commission in the army, which with his writings produced him a handsome competency; and he died, aged 86, in 1746.

SOUTHWELL, ROBERT, an English Jesuit and poet, was born in 1560; studied at Rome, and afterwards returned to England as a missionary. In 1592 he was sent to prison, where he remained three years before he was brought to trial, when, owing that he came to England in order to propagate the Catholic religion, he was condemned, and executed, in 1595. He was the author of several poems possessing considerable merit.

SOUZA, JOHN DE, a Portuguese historian, born at Damascus, in Syria, about 1730, and died at Lisbon in 1812. He was employed as secretary interpreter to the Spanish ambassador at Morocco, and published some etymological works, explanatory of the connexion between Arabic and Portuguese.

SOWERBY, JAMES, a naturalist and artist, was born in 1766. He was originally a drawing-master; but subsequently acquired considerable reputation both as a botanist and mineralogist; and published several works on each science, which he illustrated by his pencil. Died, 1822.

SPAENDONCK, GERARD VAN, an eminent flower and miniature painter, was born in 1746, at Tilburg, in Holland; settled at Paris, where he became miniature-painter to the king, and professor of iconography at the Jardin des Plantes. Died, 1822.

SPALDING, JOHN JOACHIM, a celebrated Swedish divine and author, born in 1714. He wrote several able works: the "Destination of Man;" "Religion the most important affair of Mankind," &c. Died, 1804.

SPALLANZANI, LAZARUS, an eminent naturalist, was born at Scandiano, in Italy, in 1729. He studied at Modena, and next at Bologna, where his cousin, Laura Bassi, was at that time one of the most distinguished professors in Italy. After having held professorships at Reggio and Modena, he became professor of natural history, and director of the museum, at Pavia, where he devoted himself to experimental researches into nature, and published many valuable works on physiology. He travelled over a great part of Europe and Asia; and was enrolled among the associates of numerous societies. Died, 1798. His principal works are, "Experiments on the Reproduction of Animals;" an "Essay upon Animalcula in Fluids;" "Microscopical Experiments;" "Travels in the Two Sicilies and the Apennines," 6 vols.; and an elaborate "Correspondence" with the most celebrated naturalists of the age.

SPANHEIM, FREDERIC, professor of divinity at Leyden; author of "Exercitationes de Gratia Universalis," and other learned works. Born, 1600; died, 1649.

SPANHEIM, EZEKIEL, a learned writer and statesman, was the eldest son of the preceding, and born in 1629, at Geneva, where he was appointed professor of eloquence at the age of twenty. He soon after became tutor to the son of Charles Louis, elector palatine, who employed him in several important missions. After the peace of Ryswick he was sent as ambassador to France, and from thence to England, where he died in 1710. His principal works are, "De Præstantia et usu Numismatum antiquorum," 2 vols.; and "Lettere and Dissertations on Medals."

SPARK, the Right Rev. Dr. BOWYER EDWARD, bishop of Ely, was born in 1760, and received his education at Cambridge. He was tutor to the duke of Rutland, who appointed him one of his chaplains, and presented him, first, with the rectory of Waltham on the Wolds, and subsequently with the vicarage of Scalford, and the rectory of Rednile, Leicestershire. In 1803 he was made dean of Bristol; in 1809, bishop of Chester; and, in 1812, bishop of Ely. He was the author of some Latin poems; but nothing of a theological character, except a few Sermons and diocesan Charges. Died, 1836.

SPARKMAN, ANDREW, a Swedish naturalist and traveller, was born about 1747, and studied at Upsal, where by his attention to natural history, he attracted the notice of Linnæus. He visited China, and the Cape of Good Hope; penetrated a considerable distance into the interior of Southern Africa; and accompanied Captain Cook on one of his voyages. He wrote narratives of his travels, and died at Stockholm, in 1830.

SPARROW, ANTHONY, bishop of Norwich, in the time of Charles II., was a prelate distinguished for his learning, piety, and benevolence; and is known as a writer by his "Rationale of the Book of Common Prayer." Died, 1685.

SPARTACUS, a Thracian general, who had been taken by the Romans, and made a gladiator; but escaping with a few of his companions from his tyrants, he rallied round his standard a formidable army, and repeatedly defeated the Roman forces. He was at length slain, B.C. 71.

SPEED, JOHN, a well-known English chronologist, historian, and antiquary, born in 1535. He is the author of "The Theatre of the Empire of Great Britain;" "A Cloud of Witnesses;" and "The History of Great Britain, from Julius Cæsar to James I." Died, 1629.

SPELMAN, Sir HENRY, an eminent English historian and antiquary, was born at Congham, in Norfolk, in 1561. James I. frequently employed him on public business, and he received the honour of knighthood for his services. He died in 1641, leaving many valuable works, among which are "Glossarium Archæologicum," and "Villare Anglicanum;" are still highly esteemed.—His son, Sir JOHN SPELMAN, inherited his father's taste for archaeological inquiries, and was the author of a "Life of Alfred the Great." He was knighted by Charles I., and died at Oxford, in 1643.

SPENCE, JOSEPH, a divine and critic, was born in 1694, and received his education at Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship, and was elected professor of poetry. He afterwards held the living of Great Horwood, and a prebend in Durham cathedral. He wrote an "Essay on Pope's Odyssey," but his principal work is entitled "Polymetia; or, an Inquiry into the Agreement between the Works of the Roman Poets, and the Remains of Ancient Artists." Laterly have been published the "Anecdotes collected by him, concerning eminent Literary Characters." His death, which happened in 1768, was occasioned by his having accidentally fallen into a pond.

SPENCER, Dr. JOHN, an ingenious and learned English divine and critic, was born in 1630, at Boughton, in Kent; became master of Corpus Christi college, archdeacon of Sudbury, and dean of Ely; and died in 1695. His principal and most credit work, is "De Legibus Hebræorum Rationibus et eorum Rationibus."

SPENCER, the Hon. WILLIAM ROBERT, born in 1770, was the younger son of lord Charles Spencer. He evinced a strong love for classical literature when a boy at Harrow school, and completed his studies at Oxford. In proof of his astonishing power of memory, it is gravely asserted that he undertook, for a wager, to get the whole contents of a newspaper by rote, which he won, by repeating it without the omission of a single word. He held the situation of a commissioner of stamps. Died, 1834.

[SPO]

Illustrious among our early poets, was born in London, about 1533; was educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge, and, on leaving the university, took up his residence with some relations in the north of England, probably as a tutor. In 1580, he accompanied lord Grey de Wilton, viceroy of Ireland, as his secretary, and procured a grant of 3028 acres in the county of Cork, out of the forfeited lands of the earl of Desmond; on which, however, by the terms of the gift, he was obliged to become resident. He accordingly fixed his residence at Kilcolman, in the county of Cork, where he was visited by Sir Walter Raleigh, who became his patron in lieu of Sir Philip Sidney, then deceased, and whom he celebrates under the title of the "Shepherd of the Ocean." Sir Walter persuaded him to write the "Faerie Queen," the first edition of which was printed in 1590, and presented to Elizabeth, who granted the poet a pension of 80*l.* per annum. In 1595 he published his pastoral of "Collin Clout's come home again;" and the year following, the second part of his "Faerie Queen," but the poem, according to the original plan, was never completed. About this time Spenser presented to the queen his "View of the State of Ireland;" being then clerk of the council of the province of Munster. In 1597 he returned to Ireland; but when the rebellion of Tyrone broke out, he was obliged to fly with such precipitancy, as to leave behind his infant child, whom the merciless cruelty of the insurgents burnt with the house. The unfortunate poet came to England, with a heart broken by these misfortunes, and died at Westminster, January 16, 1598-9. His remains were interred at the expense of the earl of Essex, in Westminster-abbey, where the countess of Dorset raised a monument to his memory.

SPIELMANN, JAMES REINHOLD, an eminent chemist, was born at Strasburg, in 1722. He became professor of chemistry at his native place, where, by his means, a botanic garden was established. He united to an ardour for the sciences, a love of poetry, of which he was also professor three years. Among his works are, "Elementa Chymie," "Prodromus Floræ Argentinensis," "Institutiones Medicinæ," &c. Died, 1782.

SPIGELIUS, or VANDEN SPIEGHEL, ADRIAN, a physician and anatomist, was born at Brussels, in 1576. He studied at Louvain and Padua, in which last university he became professor of anatomy and surgery; which office he discharged with such reputation, that the Venetian government made him a knight of St. Mark, and gave him a chain of gold. Died, 1635.

SPILLER, JOHN, a young English sculptor, of great promise, was born in London, in 1763, and studied under Bacon. He distinguished himself by his talents at the Royal Academy, and was chosen to execute a statue of Charles II. for the centre of the old Royal Exchange; but the much admired production had scarcely been erected before the artist expired, a victim to consumption, at the age of thirty, in 1794. "The energy of his labour, with the strong excitement of his feelings," observes Mr.

D'Irassell, "had already made fatal inroads on his constitution. But he was willing, he said, to die at the foot of his statue. The statue was raised, and the young sculptor, with the shining eyes and hectic blush of consumption, beheld it there, returned home, and shortly was no more."

SPINOLA, AMBROSE, marquis, a celebrated Spanish general, was born in 1589. He commanded an army in Flanders, and in 1604 took Ostend; for which he was made general of all the Spanish troops in the Low Countries; where he was opposed by Maurice of Nassau. During a cessation of operations, Spinola went to Paris, and in an interview with Henry IV., the monarch asked him what were his plans for the ensuing campaign? The general, without hesitation, entered into a detail of his projects; and Henry communicated to Maurice the direct contrary, as he could not believe that Spinola had revealed to him his real intentions. Finding, however, that the Spaniard was as good as his word, he exclaimed, "Others deceive by telling falsehoods, but this man by speaking the truth." In the war occasioned by the disputed succession to the duchy of Cleves and Juliers, Spinola took Aix-la-Chapelle, Wesel, and Breda. He was subsequently employed in Italy, where he made himself master of the city of Casal; but not being able to subdue the citadel, owing to the imprudent orders sent to him from Madrid, he exclaimed, "they have robbed me of my honour," and fell a prey to chagrin, in 1630.

SPINOZA, BENEDICT, a celebrated modern sceptic, was born at Amsterdam, in 1633. His parents were Portuguese Jews; who gave him the name of Baruch; which, on renouncing his religion, he altered to Benedict. He was for some time a Calvinist, and afterwards a Mennonist, but at last fell into the most dangerous scepticism, if not downright atheism. He published a work in Latin, entitled "Tractatus-theologico-politicus;" which was reprinted in London in 1766, by Hume, though without his name or that of the author. Died, 1677.

SPIZELIUS, THEOPHILUS, a learned German ecclesiastic; author of an elaborate "Commentary on the State of Literature among the Chinese," and other works. Died, 1691.

SPOHN, FREDERICK AUGUSTUS WILLIAM, an eminent German writer on philology. He was born at Dortmund, in 1792; became professor of philosophy and ancient literature at Leipzig; and died in 1824, from the effects of excessive study.

SPONDE, HENRY DE, or SPONDANUS, a French prelate and ecclesiastical historian, was born in 1568, and was educated in the protestant college at Ortez; after which he studied the law, and became so eminent as a pleader, that Henry of Navarre made him master of requests. In 1599 he changed his religion, and took orders at Rome; was made bishop of Pamiers in 1626; and died in 1643. Spodanus abridged the annals of Baronius, and continued them from 1197 to 1640. He also wrote "Annales Sacri à Mundi Creatione ad ejusdem Redemptionem."

archbishop of St. Andrew's, in Scotland, was born in 1663; educated at Glasgow; and in 1691 went as chaplain to the duke of Lennox in his embassy to France. On the accession of James VI. to the throne of England, he accompanied him; and the same year was raised to the archbishopric of Glasgow, and made one of the privy council in Scotland. In 1613, he was translated to St. Andrew's. He crowned Charles I. at Holyrood house, in 1633; and, two years afterwards, was made chancellor of Scotland; but on the breaking out of the rebellion, he retired to London, where he died in 1639, and was buried in Westminster abbey. He wrote the "History of the Church of Scotland."

SPOTSWOOD, Sir ROBERT, second son of the preceding, was put to death, by the covenants, for adhering to the marquis of Montrose.

SPRAGG, EDWARD, a brave English admiral, was a captain in the first engagement with the Dutch in 1665, when, for his gallant conduct, he was knighted by the king on board the Royal Charles. He attracted the particular notice of the duke of Albemarle in the four days' battle in 1666; and the year following, he burnt a number of Dutch fire-ships when they came up the Thames, which threw their whole fleet into confusion. In 1671, he destroyed, in the Mediterranean, seven Algerine men of war. He was sunk in his boat in an engagement with Van Tromp in 1673, as he was going from his sinking ship to another.

SPRINGER, BARTHOLOMEW, an eminent painter of Antwerp, was born in 1546, and died in 1623.

SPRAT, Dr. THOMAS, bishop of Rochester, an historian and poet, was born in 1636, and died in 1713. He wrote the "History of the Royal Society," the "History of the Ryehouse Plot," "The Life of Cowley," a volume of Sermons, and a few poems.

SPURZHEIM, GASPARD, a celebrated physiologist, was born near Treves, in 1776, and received his medical education at Vienna, where he became acquainted with Dr. Gall, the founder of the science of phrenology. To this science Spurzheim became exceedingly partial; and he soon joined Gall in making inquiries into the anatomy of the brain. They quitted Vienna in 1803, to travel; visited Paris; and lectured in England, Scotland, and Ireland, on their very curious and original system. Spurzheim finally proceeded to the United States, where he died in 1832.

SQUIRE, SAMUEL, a learned and exemplary English prelate, was born at Westminster, in 1714; and after obtaining various preferments, reached the see of St. David's; and died in 1766. He wrote several works, theological and political.

STAAL, Madame de, whose maiden name was DE LAUNAI, was the daughter of a painter at Paris, who abandoned her when a child, and she was taken into the priory of St. Louis, at Rouen. After this, she became waiting-woman to the duchess of Maine, when her literary talents were suddenly discovered by her being found to be the author of a very witty letter to M. de Fontenelle, on the subject of a beautiful girl at Paris, who was said to be possessed, which imposture was at that time occupying public attention. From that time the duchess reposed an entire confidence in her; and Mademoiselle de Launai shared in her misfortune, by being committed to the Bastille. After her release, she married M. de Staal, an officer of the Swiss guards; wrote some entertaining "Memoirs of her Life;" and died in 1780.

STACKHOUSE, THOMAS, a divine of the church of England, who was many years curate of Finchley, in Middlesex, and vicar of Benham, in Berkshire. He wrote a "Review of the Controversy concerning Miracles;" on the "Miseries of the inferior Clergy;" a "Body of Practical Divinity;" and a "Defence of the Christian Religion;" but his most important work, which has often been reprinted, is his "History of the Bible," 2 vols. folio. Born, 1680; died, 1752.—There was another Rev. THOMAS STACKHOUSE, who published "A Greek Grammar," a "General View of Ancient History, Chronology, and Geography;" and an "Atlas of Ancient and Modern Geography."

STAEL-HOLSTEIN, ANNA LOUISA GERMAINE NECKER, baroness de, was born at Paris, in 1766, where the elevation of her father, M. Necker, to the ministry of finance, brought him into close connexion with the most brilliant circles of the capital. She soon displayed signs of a precocious genius; and the encouragement to converse, which she received in this society, and the various excitements which it furnished to her faculties, had an important influence on the formation of her mind. Her earliest productions were "Sophia," a comedy, written in 1786, and two tragedies, "Lady Jane Grey," and "Montmorency;" but her "Lettres sur les Ouvrages et le Caractère de J. J. Rousseau," printed in 1788, first attracted the public notice. In 1790, she was married to the baron de Staël-Holstein, Swedish ambassador at the French court. She was warmly attached to the principles of liberty; and the breaking out of the Revolution, in 1789, necessarily exercised a powerful influence both on her mind and fate. During Robespierre's ascendancy, she exerted herself, even at the hazard of her life, to save the victims, and published a powerful and eloquent "Defence of the Queen." The populace being called to riot and murder, she attempted to leave Paris, but was detained, and escaped the popular fury only by a remarkable concurrence of circumstances. When Sweden recognized the French republic, her husband was again sent as ambassador to Paris, whither she also returned, in 1793. Barras became her friend; and she acquired so much influence, that, on Talleyrand's return from America, in 1796, she obtained, through Barras, his appointment to the ministry of foreign affairs. In Dec. 1797, she for the first time saw Buonaparte, then at Paris, preparing for his expedition to Egypt; and the admiration with which she had regarded the conqueror of Italy was succeeded by a sentiment bordering on aversion, which appears to have been mutual; and in 1801, in consequence of her attempting to thwart his government, she was ordered to quit Paris. After visiting Germany, Prussia, and Italy, she returned to France, and published her romance of "Delphine;" but this work, and a tract entitled "Les Dérègles Vues de Politique et de Finance," published by M. Necker, had given so much offence to Napoleon, (who had no great esteem for female politicians), that in 1803 he banished her from his territories. Her peregrinations were next extended to Moscow, Stockholm, and London; nor did she again behold her favourite abode, Paris, till after the restoration of Louis XVIII. On the escape of Buonaparte from Elba, she retired to Coppet; and after the battle of Waterloo, she once more made her appearance in the French capital, with her daughter, who was married to the duke de Broglie. She was favourably received by the king, and obtained an order on the royal treasury for the payment of two millions, which had been deposited there by her father. Her husband, the baron, died in 1801; and in 1811 she was married to M. de Rocca, a young French officer, by whom she had a son; but their union was kept secret till after her death. She died in 1817. Besides the works before-mentioned, she wrote the romance of "Corinne;" "Considerations on the French Revolution;" "Dramatic Essays;" "Considerations on Literature;" "Germany;" "Ten Years of Exile," &c.

STAHL, GEORGE ERNEST, an eminent German physician and chemist, was born at Anspach, in 1660; studied at Jena; became physician to the king of Prussia; and died in 1734. His discoveries and theories in medical science were highly ingenious and valuable; and he may be ranked as one of the most illustrious medical philosophers of his age.

STAHRMBERG, GUIDO BALDI, count de, a celebrated Austrian field-marshal, was born in 1657. He commanded the imperial army in Germany, Italy, and Spain; and during a long career was distinguished for his military skill and bravery. Died, 1737.

STANHOPE, JAMES, earl, a celebrated English nobleman, was born in Herefordshire, in 1673. He entered early into the army, and distinguished himself with so much bravery at the siege of Namur in 1695, that king William gave him a company and the rank of colonel. In 1705 he served as a brigadier-general under the earl of Peterborough, at the siege of Barcelona. He afterwards contributed to the victories of Almanza and Saragossa; but being intrusted with the defence of Brihuega, he was obliged to surrender it, after a gallant resistance, to the duke de Vendome. Died, 1721.

STANHOPE, CHARLES, earl, grandson of the above, a politician and man of science, born in 1753; was educated at Eton and Geneva; and came into parliament for High Wycombe, which he represented until 1780, when he succeeded his father in the peerage. He distinguished himself at an early period of the French revolution, by an open avowal of republican sentiments, and went so far as to lay aside the external ornaments of the peerage. As a man of science he ranked high, and was the author of many inventions, particularly of a method of securing buildings from fire, an arithmetical machine, a new printing press, a monochord for tuning musical instruments, and a vessel to sail against wind and tide. He was twice married, first to lady Hester Pitt, daughter of the great earl of Chatham, by whom he had three daughters; and secondly to Miss Grenville, by whom he had three sons. Died, 1816.

STANLEY, THOMAS, a learned writer, was the son of Sir Thomas Stanley, and born at Laytonstone, in Essex, in 1644. He received his education at Pembroke-hall, Cambridge; then went on his travels; and on his return took up his residence in the Middle Temple. His works are, "The History of Philosophy and Lives of Philosophers;" "Poems and Translations;" an edition of Æschylus, &c. Died, 1678.

STAPLETON, Sir ROBERT, a soldier and poet of the 17th century. On the breaking out of the civil wars, he distinguished himself by his gallant behaviour at the battle of Edgehill, in 1642; for which the king knighted him. At the Restoration he accompanied Charles II. to London, and remained about the court till his decease, in 1669. He translated Juvenal and other authors; wrote four plays; and was created LL.D. at Oxford.

STARCK, JOHN AUGUSTUS VON, a German divine and theological writer, born at Schwerin, in 1741. He was professor of Oriental literature and antiquities at St. Petersburg; subsequently filled the chair of philosophy at Mittau; and in 1781 he was appointed first preacher at the court of Darmstadt, where he was highly esteemed by the landgrave of Hesse, who in 1811 made him a baron. Among his principal works are, "The History of the First Age of the Christian Church," 3 vols.; and "The Triumph of Philosophy in the Eighteenth Century." Died, 1816.

STATIUS, PUBLIUS PAPINIUS, a Latin poet, was born at Naples, A.D. 61. His principal productions are two epic poems, the "Thebais," in twelve books; and the "Achilleis," in two books, which he left unfinished at his death, in his 35th year.

STAUNTON, Sir GEORGE LEONARD, was born in the county of Galway, in Ireland, and educated at Montpellier, where he took his medical degree. About 1762 he went to the island of Grenada, where he practised physic, and formed an intimacy with lord Macartney, the governor, who made him his secretary, and whom he accompanied to Madras, where he displayed his talents in treating with Tippono Saib, and in seizing general Stuart. On his return to England he was created a baronet, and, in 1790, received the degree of LL.D. When lord Macartney was selected as the head of the intended embassy to China, Sir George was appointed secretary of legation, with the title of envoy-extraordinary. Of that mission, and of the empire and people of China, he published an interesting account in 1797, 2 vols. 4to. He died in 1801.

and theological writer. He was educated at Cambridge, and distinguished himself greatly in the Bangorian controversy; for which bishop Sherlock made him chancellor of Salisbury. Died, 1763.

STEDMAN, JOHN GABRIEL, a military officer in the Dutch service, was born in Scotland, in 1745. He was the author of an interesting "Narrative of an Expedition against the revolted Negroes of Surinam," in 2 vols. 4to. He died at Tiverton, in Devonshire, in 1797.

STEELE, Sir RICHARD, a celebrated essayist and dramatic writer, was a native of Dublin, where his father, who was a barrister, acted in the capacity of secretary to the duke of Ormond. He obtained an ensigncy in the guards; and while in that service wrote a little treatise, called "The Christian Hero," which he dedicated to lord Cutts, who appointed him his secretary, and procured him a captain's commission in the fusiliers. In 1702 he commenced dramatic writer, in his comedy of the "Funeral, or Grief à-la-Mode," which had great success. This was followed by the "Tender Husband," and the "Lying Lover." In 1709 he began "The Tatler," a periodical paper, under the name of Isaac Bickerstaff, and in which he had the able assistance of Addison, as he also had in the "Spectator" and "Guardian;" the former commenced in 1711, and the latter in 1713. His reputation as a writer procured him the place of commissioner of the stamp-office, which he resigned on being chosen member for Stockbridge, but was expelled the house soon after for writing two alleged libels, under the titles of the "Englishman" and the "Crisis." On the accession of George I. he received the honour of knighthood, and was appointed surveyor of the stables at Hampton-court, and governor of the royal company of comedians. He was also, on the suppression of the rebellion, made one of the commissioners of the forfeited estates in Scotland. In 1722 his play of the "Conscious Lovers" was acted with great success; and, when published, was dedicated to the king, who gave the author 500*l.*; but being always engaged in some unsuccessful scheme or other, and with habits both benevolent and lavish, he wasted his regular income in anticipation of a greater, until absolute distress was the consequence. A paralytic attack at length rendered him incapable of literary exertion; and he retired to Llangunnor, in Caermarthenshire, where he died, in 1729.

STEEN, JAN, an eminent painter, was born at Leyden, in 1636. One of his masters was Van Goyen, whose daughter he married; but Steen proved a dissipated character, and totally neglected his family. Died, 1689.

STEENWICK, HENRY, a Flemish painter, was born in 1550, and died in 1603.

STEEVENS, GEORGE, a celebrated dramatic commentator, was born at Stepney, in 1736; and was educated at the grammar-school, Kingston, and King's college, Cambridge. In 1764 he published twenty of Shakspeare's plays, in 4 vols. 8vo.; and in 1770 his notes on the great dramatist were incorporated with those of Johnson in 10 vols. 8vo., and afterwards in 15 vols. Mr. Steevens, who was an elegant scholar, and well versed in old English literature, was one of the contributors to "Nichols's Literary Anecdotes of Hogarth," and also assisted in the "Biographia Dramatica." He died at Hampstead, in 1800.

STEFFANI, AGOSTINO, an Italian composer, distinguished also as a musical copyist, was born in 1635. In his youth, he was a chorister of St. Mark's, at Venice, where a German nobleman being attracted by the sweetness of his voice, took him to Bavaria, gave him a classical education, and put him under the best musicians. After this he entered into orders, and at last became bishop of Spiga. Died, 1730.

STELLA, JAMES, an eminent painter, was born in 1596, at Lyons, where his father gave him his first instructions. While at Florence he was patronized by the grand duke. He then went to Rome, where he spent several years, and on his return to France had a pension granted him, with apartments in the Louvre. He there painted several excellent pictures for the king, who honoured him with the order of St. Michael. Died, 1647.

STENO, NICHOLAS, a celebrated anatomist, was born at Copenhagen, in 1638. He was a pupil of Bartholin; and afterwards travelled into Germany, France, and Italy, where he abjured the Protestant faith. On his return home, he was made professor of anatomy; but the change of his religion having raised him enemies, he renounced medical studies for the church; and pope Innocent XII. consecrated him bishop, of partibus, of Titopolis, and vicar apostolic in the north of Europe. He was the author of many works, medical and theological; and died in 1687.

STEPHANUS BYZANTINUS, or STEPHEN of BYZANTIUM, an able Greek grammarian and lexicographer, who lived in the sixth century.

STEPHEN, king of England, the son of Stephen, count of Blois, by Adela, fourth daughter of William the Conqueror, was born in 1104. On the death of Henry I. immediately came over from Normandy, England, and laid claim to the crown, although he had been one of the most zealous in taking the oath for securing the succession to Henry's daughter, the empress Matilda. By the aid of his brother, who was bishop of Winchester, he possessed himself of the royal treasure, and was enabled to bribe some of the most restive of his opponents, while he sought the support of people at large by promising to restore laws of Edward the Confessor. After a war with the Scots, who were finally defeated the famous battle of the Standard, the press Matilda landed in England with her brother, the earl of Gloucester; and being joined by several powerful barons, a civil war ensued, which for cruelty and devastation proved one of the most calamitous in the annals of the country. After various turns of fortune, Matilda retired to Normandy, and the contest was carried on by her son, Henry Plantagenet, who in 1155 landed an army in England. Being joined by the barons of his mother's party, the competitors met at the head of their respective forces, at Wallingford; but an armistice took place instead of a battle; by which it was agreed, that Stephen should reign during his life-time, and that Henry should succeed him. In the following year Stephen died, aged 49.

STEPHEN, JAMES, an eminent lawyer and political writer, was a native of Poole, in Dorsetshire; received his education at Winchester; was brought up as a barrister; and became editor and parliamentary reporter for the "Morning Chronicle." He at length obtained an appointment in the prize court at the island of St. Christopher's, where he realized a handsome fortune; and on his return to England he formed a matrimonial alliance with the family of Mr. Wilberforce. Having acquired, while abroad, an intimate knowledge of colonial law, he now obtained a large and lucrative share of practice as an advocate in prize causes before the privy council. As the violation of territory by the masters of American vessels often came under his notice, he published his sentiments in an anonymous pamphlet, entitled "War in Disguise, or the Frauds of Neutral Flags;" when the talents and views displayed by the writer attracted the attention of government, and he was soon after introduced into parliament as a member for Tralee. He suggested and arranged the whole system of the continental blockade, which for many years occasioned the greatest embarrassment to Buonaparte; and for his services the minister appointed him a master in chancery, which office he held during twenty years. He also distinguished himself, both in the senate and by his pen, as the constant friend of African emancipation; and was regarded by the West India planters as their most formidable antagonist. Died, 1832.

STEPHENS, or ESTIENNE, the name of a French family which produced many eminent printers.—ROBERT, born in 1503, at Paris, devoted himself to learned studies. He possessed a profound knowledge of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew; as the works edited by him in those languages evince. He superintended an edition of the New Testament, which was more correct and of a more convenient form than any which had appeared; and he is honourably distinguished by his excellent "Thesaurus Lingue Latine." Died, 1559.—HENRY, born at Paris, in 1528, was distinguished for his talents, and devoted himself particularly to the study of Greek. In consequence of his attachment to the reformed doctrines, his peace was often disturbed, and his labours interrupted. He was a most learned and indefatigable scholar, and stands pre-eminent for the services which he rendered to the cause of ancient literature. Died, 1598.

STEPHENS, ROBERT, an eminent English antiquary, who collected and published a complete edition of the letters of lord Bacon, in 1702, and was appointed historiographer royal. Died, 1732.

STEPHENS, ALEXANDER, a miscellaneous writer, was born in 1757, at Elgin, in Scotland; studied at Aberdeen; was designed for the law, but quitted it for literature; and wrote, or contributed to, the following works: "A History of the War of the French Revolution;" "Memoirs of Horne Tooke;" "Public Characters;" "The Annual Obituary;" the "Monthly Magazine," &c. Died, 1821.

STEPNEY, GEORGE, an English poet, statesman, and political writer; born, 1663; died, 1707.

STERNE, RICHARD, archbishop of York, was born at Mansfield, in Nottinghamshire, in 1596. He was chaplain to archbishop Laud, whom he attended on the scaffold; suffered many hardships till the Restoration; but was then made bishop of Carlisle, and translated thence to York. He had a share in the Polyglott, and was concerned in the revival of the Book of Common Prayer. Died, 1683.

STERNE, LAURENCE, a divine and miscellaneous writer, of a very singular and original cast, was a grandson of the preceding, and born in 1713, at Clonmel, in Ireland, where his father, a lieutenant in the army, was at that time stationed. He was educated at a school near Halifax, and at Jesus college, Cambridge; successively obtained the living of Sutton, a prebend at York, the rectory of Stillington, and the curacy of Coxwold. For many years he was little known beyond the vicinity of his pastoral residences; the only production of his pen being his humorous satire upon a greedy church dignitary of York, entitled, the "History of a Watch Coat." In 1759 following, appeared the first two volumes of his celebrated "Tristram Shandy," which drew upon him praise and censure of every kind, and became so popular, that a bookseller engaged for its completion on very lucrative terms. He now spent some years in travelling on the continent, and in 1768 he produced his "Sentimental Journey," which, by a number of pathetic incidents, and vivid strokes of national and characteristic delineation, is rendered extremely entertaining, and acquired a more general reputation than even its predecessor. He afterwards published three volumes of "Sermons," and several minor pieces. Died, 1768. That Sterne possessed a fund of wit and humour, none who have read his works can doubt; but his occasional indecencies are disgusting, and, considering his clerical character, deserve the severest reprehension.

STERNHOLD, THOMAS, a poet, was born in Hampshire, and educated at Oxford; after which he became groom of the robes to Henry VIII. and Edward VI. He died in 1549. Sternhold versified fifty-one of the Psalms; the remainder were the productions of Hopkins, Norton, and others.

STEVENS, GEORGE ALEXANDER, a whimsical and eccentric character, was born in London, and brought up to a mechanical business, which he quitted to become a strolling player. He wrote a novel, called "Tom Fool;" "The Birth-day of Folly," and "Religion," &c. two poems; and subsequently invented his entertainment, called a "Lecture on Heads," a prose satire on the manners of the times, possessing no small portion of drollery, and which became very popular. Several of his songs, including "The Storm," have also been much admired. Died, 1784.

STEVENS, ALEXANDER, an able English architect. The bridge over the Liffey, in Dublin, the locks and docks on the grand canal of Ireland, the aqueduct over the Loue at Lancaster, &c. are ample proofs of his professional skill. Died, 1796.

STEVENS, WILLIAM BARSHAW, a divine and poet, was born at Ablington, about 1758, and died in 1800. Dr. Stevens was the author of a poem, entitled "Retirement," three volumes of sermons, &c.

STEVENSON, Sir JOHN ANDREW, an eminent musical composer, was born at Dublin, in 1761. At ten years of age, he was received into the choir school of Christ church, where he attained the elements of a musical education, and soon gave promise of those abilities for which he was afterwards so deservedly celebrated. In connection with Mr. T. Moore, he rescued the matchless airs of their native land from oblivion, by adapting them to the words of the "Irish Melodica," and enriching the accompaniments with the elaborate graces of modern science. He also produced a much-admired oratorio, entitled "The Thanksgiving;" and a great variety of anthems, glees, solos, duets, and songs; many of which still retain their popularity. Died, 1833.

STEVENSON, JOHN HALL, a humorous poet and satirist, was born in Yorkshire, in 1718; was educated at Jesus college, Cambridge; became intimate with Laurence Sterne, who describes him as "Eugenius" in his Tristram Shandy; and appears, from the various accounts that are given of him, to have been the very kind of man that his friend portrays. His works consist of "Crazy Tales;" "Fables for Grown Gentlemen;" "Lyric Epistles;" and "Moral Tales." Died, 1785.

STEVIN, or STEVINUS, SIMON, a Flemish mathematician, who was master of mathematics to prince Maurice, of Nassau, and inspector of the dykes of Holland. Died, 1633.

STEWART DENHAM, Sir JAMES, a writer on political economy, was born at Edinburgh, in 1713, and was the only son of Sir James Stewart, of Gossetrees, Solicitor-general of England under queen Anne and George I. He was educated at the university of Edinburgh; and became an advocate. In 1740 he married the daughter of the earl of Wemyss, and great expectations were entertained of his rising in his profession; but these were disappointed by the part he took in the Rebellion of 1745. In that last struggle of the house of Stuart, Sir James co-operated so zealously as to be obliged to go into exile. In 1757 he published, at Frankfurt, his "Apologie du Sentiment de Monsieur le chevalier Newton, sur l'Antienne Chronologie des Grecs." Ten years after this, he was restored to his native country and the estate of his ancestors, where he died in 1780. His most valuable work is entitled "An Inquiry into the Principles of Political Economy," which is, however, considerably obscured by the defects of style. Died, 1780.

STEWART, MATTHEW, an eminent mathematician, was born at Rothsay, in the Isle of Bute, in 1717. He studied mathematics at Edinburgh under MacLaurin, whom he succeeded in his professorship; on which occasion he published his "General Theorems." In 1761 appeared his "Tracts, Physical and Mathematical," in which he proposed to deduce a theory of the moon, and to determine the sun's distance from the earth. He was also the author of a "Treatise on the Sun's Distance," and one entitled "Propositiones more veterum demonstratæ." He died in 1783.

STEWART, DUGALD, an eminent philosopher and metaphysician, son of the preceding, was born, in 1753, at Edinburgh; received his education in the high school; and, in 1780, became professor of moral philosophy at the university. It was not till 1792 that he came forward as an author; he then published the first volume of the "Philosophy of the Human Mind;" which was followed by "Outlines of Moral Philosophy;" "Philosophical Essays;" Memoirs of Adam Smith, and Dr. Robinson and Reid; and Prefatory Dissertations to the Supplement of the Encyclopædia Britannica. He enjoyed the reputation of being one of the ablest among modern philosophical writers, and an amiable man. Died, 1828.

STILES, EZRA, an American divine and historian, born in 1737. He was president of Yale college; and, among other works, published a very curious "History of three of the Judges of King Charles I., Major-general Whalley, Major-general Goffe, and Colonel Dixwell, who, at the Restoration, 1660, fled to America, and were secreted in Massachusetts and Connecticut for nearly thirty Years." Died, 1798.

STILICHO, a general in the service of Theodosius the Great, whose niece, Serena, he married. After quelling an invasion of the Goths, and suppressing a revolt in Africa, he marched against Alaric, whom he signally defeated at Pollentia. He subsequently, however, entered into a treaty with him, which excited the suspicion of Honorius, and he was doomed to suffer the death of a traitor.

STILL, JOHN, bishop of Bath and Wells, died in 1607. He is the reputed author of "Gammer Gorton's Needle," a dramatic piece of low humour, very characteristic of the manners of our ancestors in that day.

STILLINGFLEET, EDWARD, bishop of Worcester, a prelate of great learning and piety, was born at Cranbourne, in Dorsetshire, in 1633; was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge; obtained various preferments, among which were the archdeaconry of London and the deanery of St. Paul's; and was promoted to the see of Worcester at the Revolution. His works, which are erudite, pious, and philosophical, comprehend the "Origines Sacre," a rational account of natural and revealed religion, still held in high esteem for its powers of argument and eloquence; and "Origines Britannicæ." Died, 1699.

STILLINGFLEET, BENJAMIN, a grandson of the preceding, was born in 1702. He obtained the appointment of barrack-master at Kensington; and was known as the author of "The Calendar of Flora;" "Miscellaneous Tracts in Natural History;" and a "Treatise on the Principles and Power of Harmony." Died, 1771.

STILPO, a stoic philosopher of Megara, who lived about 306 B.C. He acquired so great a reputation for his sagacity and virtue, that, when Demetrius took Megara, he forbade any one to injure either his person or property. He was one of the chiefs of the stoic sect; and several states submitted their disputes to his judgment.

STOBÆUS, JOHN, a Greek writer who lived in the fifth century. He made a large collection of extracts from ancient poets and philosophers, which "Excerpta" were first printed at Venice in 1536.

STOCK, SIMON, general of the order of Carmelites, was by birth an Englishman, and died in 1265. He is celebrated as the institutor of the Scapulary, which the zealous Romanists believe he received from the Virgin Mary, in a vision, with a promise that all who wore it, or one consecrated like it, should be sure of her protection in every emergency.

STOFFLET, NICHOLAS, a French royalist chief, who commanded in La Vendée, was born in 1751, at Lunéville. In 1793 he was placed at the head of a division of royalists, and distinguished himself in no less than a hundred and fifty actions with the republicans. He was at length made prisoner, and shot at Angers, in 1796.

STOLBERG, FREDERIC LEOPOLD, count, a German distinguished for his talents, was born in 1750, at Bramstedt, in Holstein; was educated at Halle and Göttingen; was employed in various negotiations by the duke of Oldenburg and the prince regent of Denmark; and died in 1819. His leisure was dedicated to study; he translated the Iliad and the tragedies of Æschylus; and wrote a "History of the Christian Religion," 15 vols.; the "History of Alfred the Great;" "Travels in Germany, Switzerland, and Italy;" Odes, Satires, Dramas, &c.

STONE, EDMUND, an eminent mathematician, was a native of Scotland, his father being gardener to the duke of Argyle. At the age of eighteen he was discovered by that nobleman reading Newton's Principia; upon which he entered into conversation with him, and learnt, with astonishment, that he had been self-instructed in arithmetic, geometry, Latin, and French. The duke, in consequence, took him under his protection, and placed him in a situation to pursue his favourite studies. He produced a "Mathematical Dictionary;" "Fluxions;" a "Treatise on Euclid, with a Life;" "Eikon on Mathematical Instruments," &c. Died, 1768.

STONEHOUSE, Sir JAMES, a physician and divine, was born in Berkshire, in 1716. After practising twenty years as a physician, he entered into orders, and obtained the lectureship of All Saints', Bristol. He was for several years of his life an infidel, and even wrote a pamphlet against revealed religion, which reached three editions; but by reading Dr. Doddridge's Rise and Progress of Religion, he was converted. He succeeded to the title of baronet in 1791, and died at Bristol in 1796. He wrote "The Sick Man's Friend," and other religious pamphlets.

STORACE, STEPHANO, a favourite musician and composer for the English theatre, was born in London, in 1763; studied in Italy, and, on his return, was appointed composer to Drury-lane theatre. His music in "The Haunted Tower," "Siege of Belgrade," "No Song no Sapper," &c. as well as several pieces composed for the Italian Opera, were well received by the public, and are still in high repute; his compositions being remarkable for their spirit, melody, and brilliancy. Died, 1798.—His sister, ANNE SELINA STORACE, was an accomplished singer and actress, and became a first-rate favourite in her profession. Died, 1814.

STOTHARD, THOMAS, R.A., an eminent English artist, was born in London, in 1755; received his education at a school in Yorkshire; and was apprenticed to a calico-printer, in Spitalfields. During his apprenticeship he showed a decided taste for the painter's art; and, having been once introduced, soon found ample employment in making designs for the book-sellers. So fertile was he in resources, that it was a matter of little moment to him what the nature of the subject was that he might be required to illustrate; whether pastoral, historic, humorous, pathetic, or sublime; but it is generally allowed, that his fêtes champêtres were among his most happy productions; there beauty, joy, serenity, innocence, modesty, and loveliness of form are all combined. It is said, that the designs made by Mr. Stothard exceed five thousand in number; it is difficult, therefore, to select from among so vast a stock; but perhaps those which particularly claim our attention are, "The Pilgrimage to Canterbury;" the "Wellington Shield," etched by the artist himself; "The Four Periods of a Sailor's Life;" and the "Flitch of Bacon." To these may be added his illustrations of Milton, Shakespeare, Spenser, Don Quixote, the Pilgrim's Progress, Bell's British Poets, Robinson Crusoe, Rogers's Italy, &c. &c. Though, during the latter period of his venerable life, many powerful rivals in the pictorial art had captivated the public by their masterly productions, and thereby thrown a passing shadow over his well-earned fame, yet had he still "a world of sweet imaginings within," and he reached an octogenarian age without having sustained any very sensible diminution of his long and lasting reputation. He died in 1834.

STOTHARD, CHARLES ALFRED, son of the preceding, was born in 1787. He exhibited at an early age a great fondness for drawing, which ere long ripened into an enthusiastic love for the art; and he became particularly celebrated for the faithful delineation of ancient costume. In 1810 appeared his admirable picture of the "Death of Richard II.," and in the same year he commenced the publication of his "Monumental Effigies of Great Britain." He was a member and historical draughtsman of the Society of Antiquaries; by whom he was deputed to take drawings from the famous tapestry at Bayeux, in Normandy; and in 1819 he also made a series of drawings from the paintings then recently discovered on the walls of the painted chamber in the House of Lords. His death was the effect of an accident while engaged in his professional labours. As he was in the act of tracing the stained glass in a window over the altar of the parish church of Bere Ferrers, in Devonshire, the ladder on which he was standing gave way, and he was instantaneously killed, May 28, 1821.

STOW, JOHN, a celebrated antiquary, was born in Cornhill, about 1525. He was bred a tailor, but began early to study the antiquities of his country; in which he was encouraged by archbishop Parker, and the earl of Leicester. His first work was the "Summary of the Chronicles of England;" which he enlarged in 1600, and published under the title of "Flores Historiarum, or Annals of this Kingdom from the time of the Ancient Britons." In 1598 appeared the first edition of his "Survey of London." In his old age he was reduced to such indigence, as to solicit charity by means of a brief. Died, 1605.

STOWELL, the Right Hon. WILLIAM SCOTT, lord,—son of W. Scott, a merchant of Newcastle, and elder brother of lord Eldon,—was born at Heworth, Durham, in 1745, the memorable year of the rebellion in Scotland; from which a curious incident took place, not altogether undeserving of notice here. Newcastle, like most other towns in the north, was at that time in full expectation of receiving a visit from the rebels; the town walls were planted with cannon, and every practicable measure adopted to withstand a siege. Many families retired into the country; and it was desirable that Mrs. Scott, who was then far advanced in pregnancy, should be removed; but egress in any common way was next to impossible; her residence being in Love-lane, a narrow street adjoining to the public quay, and the town-wall at that time ran along the quay, between Love-lane and the river Tyne. In this emergency it was contrived to let her down in a clothes-basket, from the top of the wall to the quay, where a boat was in readiness to receive her, and by which she was conveyed down the river to Heworth, a village about three miles distant, where she soon gave birth to twins—the subject of this article, and a daughter named Barbara. Lord Stowell received the first rudiments of his classical education, with his brother the earl of Eldon, at the Newcastle grammar-school, and completed it at Corpus Christi college, Oxford. He afterwards removed to University college, and in his 20th year was appointed one of the tutors. About the year 1776 Mr. Scott retired from the tutorship of the university, and devoted himself to severe study in that branch of the legal profession of which he afterwards became so great an ornament. In 1779 he took the degree of D.C.L., and soon after commenced his career as an advocate in the civil law courts. Here he rose to the highest eminence with unparalleled rapidity. He was appointed king's advocate-general in 1787; shortly after, judge of the Consistory court, vicar-general of the province of Canterbury, and master of the Faculties. He was knighted in 1798, and in 1798 became judge of the high court of Admiralty, and a privy-councillor. In 1790 he entered parliament as the representative of Downton, and in the following year had the honour of being unanimously elected as member for the university of Oxford; which he retained till the coronation of George IV.; when he was created a peer. "Devoting his brilliant talents and extraordinary acumen to the noblest branch of his profession—the study of international law—and living in times when a general war called all this knowledge into action, his decisions have passed into precedents, equal, if not superior, in authority, to those of the venerable fathers of the science, Puffendorf, Grotius, Vattel, &c." He was an accomplished scholar, a profound reasoner, and an uncompromising supporter of our most venerable institutions. Died, Jan. 28, 1836.

STRABO, a celebrated Greek historian and geographer, was born at Amasia, in Cappadocia, about 19 A.D., and travelled through Greece, Italy, Egypt, and Asia, endeavouring to obtain the most accurate information in regard to the geography, statistics, and political conditions of the countries which he visited. The time of his death is unknown. His great geographical work, in seventeen books, contains a full account of the manners and governments of different people.

STRADA, FAMILIUS, an Italian historian and modern Latin poet, was born at Rome in 1572. He joined the society of the Jesuits, and became professor of rhetoric at the Roman college, where he resided till his death, in 1649. His most famous works are, a "History of the Wars in the Netherlands," and "Prolusiones Academicæ."

STRAFFORD, THOMAS WENTWORTH, earl of, an eminent statesman and minister, was born in London, in 1593. After having travelled on the continent, he was knighted, and made custos-rotulorum of the west-riding of Yorkshire. In 1621 he was chosen to represent the county; and for some years he was one of the most active friends of the popular cause; he was, however, gained over by the court in 1628; was made a viscount; and in 1632 he was sent over to Ireland as lord deputy. During his seven years' government there he exercised great severity; but on visiting England in 1640 he was rewarded with the title of earl of Strafford, and the dignity of lord lieutenant. But the counsels he gave to his royal master were unsuited to the times, and caused his speedy downfall. He was impeached by the Commons, and brought to trial in March, 1641. He defended himself with eloquence and dignity; and though no moral doubt existed of his crime, the legal proof was defective: his enemies, therefore, in order to secure their victim, resorted to a bill of attainder; and the unhappy nobleman, no longer supported by his sovereign, perished on the scaffold, May 12, 1641.

STRANGE, Sir ROBERT, an eminent engraver, was born in one of the Orkney islands, in 1721. He first studied painting; but having entered into the army of the Pretender in 1745, he for a time lived in concealment, and afterwards went to Paris, where he became a pupil of Le Bas, a celebrated landscape engraver; and on settling in London, he applied himself to historical engraving, in which he arrived at great excellence. In 1760 he went to Italy, where he was chosen a member of the academies of Rome, Florence, and Bologna; he was knighted in 1787, and died in 1792.

STRATO, a philosopher of Lampsacus, whose tenets approached nearer to those of the materialists of modern times than those of any of the ancient sages. He flourished in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus.

STRAUCHIUS, ÆGIDIUS, an eminent mathematician and controversialist, born at Wittenberg, in 1632. He was a zealous Lutheran, and wrote fiercely against the Calvinists: he is, however, better known as a mathematician than a polemic; and his "Breviarium Chronologicum" is a very excellent work. Died, 1682.

STREATER, ROBERT, an English painter, excelling in history, architecture, and landscape. At the Restoration, he was made serjeant-painter to the king. Born, 1624; died, 1680.

STRIGELIUS, VICTORINUS, a German divine of the 16th century, who, in the controversies at that time going on between the different sects of reformers, attached himself to Melancthon and Luther, and displayed great moderation and good sense. He was the author of "Scholæ Historiæ;" "Epitome Doctrinæ de primo Motu," &c. Born, 1524; died, 1569.

STROEMER, MARTIN, an astronomer and natural philosopher, born in 1707, at Upsal, where he succeeded Celsius. Died, 1770.

STROGONOFF, count ALEXANDER DE, a wealthy Russian nobleman. He was president of the Academy of the Fine Arts at St. Petersburg; and employed his riches in patronizing the arts and its professors. Died, 1811.

STROZZI, PHILIP, a celebrated Florentine patriot, who after the death of pope Clement VII. undertook the hazardous enterprise of restoring the liberties of his country, and the expulsion of Alessandro de' Medici. For this purpose he drew over to his party Lorenzo de' Medici, called the younger, who, on the 6th of January, 1537, assassinated his relation, and then escaped to Venice. The perpetration of this crime did not answer the object of those who contrived it; for Cosmo de' Medici succeeded to the government, and the authority of that family became fully established. Having been taken prisoner, and apprehending he should be put to the torture to force a disclosure of his accomplices, he resolved to anticipate the trial by a voluntary death, and finding a sword, which had been negligently left in the apartment by one of his guards, he plunged it into his breast, and immediately expired. This event took place in 1538.

STROZZI, PETER, son of the preceding, having with the rest of the family taken refuge in France, rose to the rank of field marshal, and signalized himself by his services, both by land and sea. In 1548 he was sent to Scotland, with a body of Italians, to act against the English; and in 1558 he contributed to the capture of Calais; but in the same year he received a mortal wound at the siege of Thionville.—His son PHILIP proved equally valorous as the rest of his family, but his end was unfortunate; for when wounded in a fight with the Spanish fleet, off the island of St. Michael, he was thrown overboard alive by order of the admiral, and perished, in 1592.

STROZZI. Several poets of this name may be mentioned. TITUS and HERCULUS, father and son, natives of Ferrara, both of whom died at the beginning of the 6th century.—GIULIO STROZZI, who distinguished himself by a fine poem on the origin of the city of Venice, entitled "Venetia edificata." Died, 1636.—Also NICHOLAS STROZZI, who died in 1654. He was the author of two tragedies, "David of Trebizonde," and "Conradus;" also "Idylls," "Sonnets," &c.

STRUENSEE, JOHN FREDERIC, a celebrated political character, was born at Halle, in Saxony, in 1737. He was brought up to medicine, and became physician to the king of Denmark, whom he accompanied on his tour to Germany, France, and England. Soon after the marriage of Christian VII. with the princess Matilda of England, Struensee became a decided favourite of the young queen; and after a long course of conflicts and court intrigues, count Bernstorff and the other ministers of Christian were obliged to yield to him and his friend count Brandt. Taking advantage of the extreme imbecility of the monarch, he gradually contrived to direct the whole affairs of government. This at length roused the jealousy of the principal nobility, who, aided by the young queen's mortal enemy, the queen-dowager, entered into a conspiracy to destroy him and his party, which they effected in the following manner. On the night of the 16th Jan. 1772, they suddenly aroused the king in his bed, and making him believe that his life was in danger, obtained his order for arresting the queen, Struensee, Brandt, and all their adherents; and the result was, that they were tried and convicted as traitors on the most preposterous charges. Struensee and Brandt were beheaded and quartered; and the queen, who was confined in the castle of Cronenburgh, would have probably shared a similar fate, had not a British fleet appeared in the Baltic, and conveyed her to Zell; where she died in 1776.

STRUTT, JOSEPH, an artist and antiquary, was born in 1749, at Springfield, in Essex; and was a pupil of Ryland the engraver. Uniting the study of antiquities with the practice of his art, he published in 1773, his work entitled the "Regal and Ecclesiastical Antiquities of England," containing representations of the English monarchs, from Edward the Confessor, to Henry VIII. This was followed, among other works, chiefly of an antiquarian cast, by his "Biographical Dictionary of Engravers," in two volumes, and his "Complete View of the Dresses and Habits of the People of England." In 1801 he published his last and favourite work, entitled the "Sports and Pastimes," &c., with numerous plates. He was also the author of "Queen Hoo Hall;" "Ancient Times;" and "The Test of Guilt." Died, 1802.

STRUVE, GEORGE ADAM, an eminent German jurist, born in 1619, was first counsellor of the city of Brunswick; was employed in several important affairs by the princes of Saxony; and wrote some able works on the feudal and civil law. Died, 1692.

STRUVE, BURCHARD GOTTHELF, son of the preceding, was a learned and indefatigable German bibliographer. His talents attracted much notice at Jena, where he lectured on philosophy, antiquities, &c. His works on history, law, and philosophy, are numerous, and highly esteemed. Born, 1671; died, 1738.

STRYPE, JOHN, an ecclesiastical historian and biographer, was born at Stepney, in 1643; was educated at St. Paul's school, and at Jesus college, Cambridge; and enjoyed the living of Low Layton, in Essex, sixty years, although he was never inducted. During his residence at this place, he applied diligently to the study of the English history, and, by procuring access to numerous collections of manuscripts, was enabled to throw more light upon the period of the Reformation than any writer who went before him. His chief works are "Ecclesiastical Monuments," 3 vols. folio; "Annals of the Reformation," 4 vols. folio; and an augmented edition of Stow's "Survey of London," 2 vols. folio. He also wrote the lives of the archbishops Cranmer, Parker, Grindall, and Whitgift; and those of Sir John Cheke, Sir Thomas Smith, and bishop Aylmer. During the latter part of his life he was rector of Hackney, where he died in 1797, aged 94.

STUART, HENRY BENEDICT MARIA CLEMENT, cardinal of York, younger brother of Charles Edward, the Pretender, and the last descendant of the royal line of the Stuarts, was born at Rome, in 1725. When the last grand effort for the restoration of his family in 1745, proved abortive, he took orders, and in 1747 pope Benedict XIV. raised him to the purple. The extraordinary events arising out of the French revolution had the effect of making the cardinal a dependant on the bounty of the king of England; for having been obliged to flee to Venice when the French invaded Italy, he was indebted for his support to a pension from the English court. Died, 1807.

STUART, GILBERT, an eminent historical writer, was born at Edinburgh, in 1743, and received his education in that university. He studied jurisprudence, but became an author by profession. In his twenty-second year, he published a "Dissertation concerning the Antiquity of the British Constitution;" for which he was complimented with the degree of LL.D. His next work was a "View of Society in Europe;" but being disappointed of the professorship of law at Edinburgh, he removed to London, and became a writer in the Monthly Review. He however returned in 1773, and commenced "The Edinburgh Magazine and Review," which was discontinued in 1776. Besides the works before mentioned, he wrote "The History of Scotland;" a "History of the Reformation of Scotland;" &c. Dropery, brought on by a life of intemperance, caused his death in 1788.

STUART, JAMES, commonly called ATHERNIAN STUART, a celebrated traveller, antiquary, and delineator of Athenian architecture, was born in London, in 1713. He originally gained his livelihood by painting fans; but having made himself master of Greek, Latin, and the mathematics, he travelled to Italy on foot, and afterwards visited Athens, in company with Nicholas Revett, a skilful architect, where they employed themselves in making drawings of the architectural relics which have escaped the ravages of time and violence. On his return to England, he became eminent as an architect; and was appointed surveyor to Greenwich hospital; became F.R.S. and F.S.A., and published the result of his foreign labours in a valuable work, entitled "The Antiquities of Athens," 4 vols. folio. Died, 1788.

STUBBS, GEORGE, a painter, was born at Liverpool, in 1724; studied at Rome; and on his return, settled in London, where he distinguished himself as a painter of animals, particularly horses. He was an associate of the Royal Academy; and published "The Anatomy of the Horse;" and a "Comparative Anatomical Exposition of the Structure of the Human Body, with that of a Tiger, and a common Fowl." Died, 1806.

STUBBS, or STUBBE, JOHN, a spirited lawyer, and celebrated political writer, was born about 1541, and educated at Corpus Christi college, Cambridge, whence he removed to Lincoln's Inn. When the duke of Anjou became a suitor to queen Elizabeth, Stubbs, who had become a puritan, published a pamphlet against the alliance, entitled "The discovery of a gaping Gulph, wherein England is likely to be swallowed up by another French Marriage." For this he was condemned to have his right hand cut off; and when the barbarous sentence was executed, Stubbs, with amazing fortitude, took off his cap with his left hand, and cried "God save the queen."

STUCKIUS, JOHN WILLIAM, a Swiss critic and antiquary of the 16th century, was a native of Zurich. He wrote a learned work on the "Feasts of the Ancients;" "Commentaries on Arian;" and other works. Died, 1607.

STUKELEY, WILLIAM, a celebrated English antiquary, was born at Holbeach, in Lincolnshire, in 1687; was educated at Bene't college, Cambridge, where he devoted his time principally to medical studies, and took the degree of M.B. He then settled at Boston, but removed to London in 1717, and in 1720 was admitted a fellow of the College of Physicians. In 1726, he went to reside at Grantham, where he acquired great reputation as a medical practitioner; but repeated attacks of the gout induced him to relinquish his profession and enter into holy orders; and he was presented to the living of All Saints, in Stamford. In 1747 the duke of Montague gave him the rectory of St. George the Martyr, Queen-square, where he died, 1765. Dr. Stukeley pursued his antiquarian researches with an unusual degree of spirit and enthusiasm, and he made important accessions to our knowledge of the early monuments of human art and industry belonging to our native country. His principal works are "Itinerarium Curiosum; or an account of the Antiquities and Curiosities of Great Britain," 2 vols. folio; "Palæographia Sacra; or Discourses on the Monuments of Antiquity, that relate to Sacred History," 4to.; "An Account of Stonehenge," folio; "Palæographia Britannica," 4to.; "The History of Carausius," 3 vols. 4to., &c.

STURM, CHRISTOPHER CHRISTIAN, a German divine, born at Augsburg, in 1740. He is chiefly known as the author of "Reflections on the Works of God," which has been frequently reprinted in England and other countries, as well as in his own. He also published "Morning Converses with God, for every Day in the Year," &c. Died, 1786.

STURGES, JOHN, a divine and theological writer, chancellor of the diocese and prebendary of Winchester; of which cathedral chapter he was, for nearly half a century, a useful and distinguished member. He published "Considerations on the present State of the Church Establishment;" "Discourses on the Evidence of Natural and Revealed Religion," &c.; but he acquired his chief literary notoriety by his controversy with the polemical historian of Winchester, Dr. Milner, who replied to his objections, in his well-known "Letters to a Prebendary." Dr. Sturges died at Alverstoke, Hants, in 1807, and was buried in Winchester cathedral.

STURMIUS, JOHN, whose learning acquired him the name of the "German Cicero," was born in 1507, at Sleiden, near Cologne. His talents were not confined to mere scholastic learning, but well adapted to politics, and the business of life, of which he gave many striking proofs. He formed an academy at Strasburg in 1537; and such was his fame, that the emperor Maximilian II. was induced to raise it to an university in 1566, of which Sturmius was the first rector. He was the author of several original works and translations from classic authors. Died, 1589.—There were several other ingenious scholars of this name, among whom should be noticed, JOHN CHRISTOPHER STURMIUS, author of Mathesis Juvenilis, 2 vols.; "Physica Moderna Compendium;" "Prælectiones Academicæ," &c. He died at Altdorf, in 1703, leaving a son, LEONARD CHRISTOPHER STURMIUS, who was a celebrated engineer, and the author of a "Complete Course of Architecture," 16 vols. Died, 1719.

STURT, JOHN, an engraver, was born in London, in 1658. He is principally celebrated for the extraordinary minuteness and beauty of his letters. The most curious of his works, is the "Book of Common Prayer," which he executed on silver plates. Each page is headed with a vignette; and prefixed to the book, is a portrait of George I., the lines of the face being expressed by writing so small, as scarcely to be read with a magnifying glass.

This writing consists of the Lord's Prayer, the Decalogue, the prayers for the royal family, and the 31st Psalm. Died, 1730.

SUARD, JOHN BAPTIST ANTHONY, a French writer, was born at Besançon, in 1733. He acquired considerable reputation as the editor of the "Journal de Paris," and other political publications. He also wrote a "Life of Tasso," and contributed greatly to the "Biographie Universelle." Died, 1817.

SUAREZ, FRANCIS, a Spanish jesuit, was born at Grenada, in 1548; was appointed professor at Coimbra, by Philip II.; and died at Lisbon, in 1617. His "Treatise on Laws" has been highly esteemed; but his "Defensio Catholicæ," written in obedience to the papal command, against the English reformation, was burnt at St. Paul's by order of James I.

SUBTERMANS, JUSTUS, a portrait and historical painter of Antwerp, who died in 1681.

SUCHET, LOUIS GABRIEL, duke of Albufera, a brave and skilful French general, was born at Lyons, in 1772, and entered the army as a volunteer. He distinguished himself in Italy and Switzerland on numerous occasions; and before the end of the year 1800 he had attained the rank of major-general. The battles of Marengo and Austerlitz added to his fame; and in 1808 he was appointed to the command of the troops in the south-east of Spain, which he retained till the French were expelled from the Peninsula. During that period he displayed great knowledge of the art of war, and his services were rewarded with the rank of marshal, and a dukedom. On Napoleon's return from Elba, the frontiers of Savoy were entrusted to his defence. Died, 1836.

SUCKLING, SIR JOHN, a poet and courtier, was born at Whittington, in Middlesex, in 1609. His father, who was comptroller of the royal household, sent him early on his travels, and he served a campaign in the army of Gustavus Adolphus. On his return he acquired reputation as a wit and a dramatist; and at the beginning of the Scotch rebellion, he raised a troop of horse for the king's service, but their conduct in the field disgraced both themselves and their commander. An abortive attempt to effect the escape of the earl of Strafford, confined in the Tower under articles of impeachment from the commons, implicated Sir John so seriously, that he thought it advisable to retire to France, where he died in 1641. His writings consist of letters, plays, and poems; the last of which have obtained a place in standard collections.

SUETONIUS, CAIUS TRANQUILLUS, a Latin historian, who lived in the first and second centuries of the Christian era. He distinguished himself as an advocate; obtained the tribuneship through the influence of Pliny the younger; and was appointed secretary to the emperor Adrian. His "Lives of the Twelve Cæsars," and "Notices of celebrated Grammarians, Rhetoricians, and Poets," are extant, and still held in high esteem.

Roman general, who distinguished himself in the year 37, by reducing the revolted Mauritians. In 59, he was appointed to the government of Britain, and was the general who vanquished the troops of the heroic Boadicea.

SUETT, RICHARD, a celebrated comic actor, excelling in ludicrous comedy and broad farce. He was a native of London; trod the boards of the Haymarket theatre while a mere youth; and, after improving himself at York and other places, made his debut, in 1781, at Drury-lane, where he became a general favourite. Died, 1805.

SUEUR, EUSTACHE LE, an eminent French painter, was born at Paris, in 1617. He was the disciple of Simon Vouet, but far surpassed him, and acquired the appellation of "the French Raphael." Died, 1685.

SUEUR, THOMAS LE, a mathematician and ecclesiastic, was born at Rethel, in Champagne, in the year 1703. He entered into the order of Minims, and became a celebrated professor of mathematics, philosophy, and theology, in the college of Sapienza, at Rome; where he died, in 1770. He joined with father Jacquier in a Commentary upon Newton's Principia; and also in a profound work on the "Integral Calculus." Le Sueur also published "The Principles of Natural Philosophy," 4 vols.; and "Institutiones Philosophicæ," 5 vols.

SUFFIELD, HENRY HARBORD, lord, was the third son of Sir Harbord Harbord, who was raised to the peerage in 1786. He was born in 1781, and bred to the bar; but he took a deep interest in politics, and was, in 1806, returned to serve in parliament for Great Yarmouth, which borough he represented until 1812. In 1820 he was returned for Shaftesbury; but his elder brother dying in the following year without issue, Mr. Harbord succeeded to the family title and estate as (the third) Lord Suffield,—his late constituents voting him a tribute of their respect, for his independent conduct in parliament. He had been employed under Lord Castlereagh's administration; but in 1819, his ardour in urging an enquiry into the occurrences which had taken place at Manchester, in opposition to the entreaties of his family and political connexions, caused a breach between them, and large pecuniary sacrifices to himself. To his determined efforts many improvements in the laws are owing; viz. prison discipline, the game laws, the abolition of colonial slavery, &c. His death was caused by the stumbling of his horse while riding down Constitution hill on his way to the House of Lords, by which he was thrown, and the animal rolled over him. He died on the 6th of July, 1835.

SUGER, the abbé, a celebrated French statesman, was born at Touri, in Beauce, in 1082. He was, successively, minister of state to Louis VII. and Louis le Gros; and in 1122 was made abbot of St. Denis, though he still continued to act in his political character. Died, 1152.

SUHM, PETER FREDERIC, an eminent Danish historian, was born at Copenhagen, in 1738; held various important offices under the government, and ultimately became historiographer royal. He interfered very little in state affairs, but was indefatigable in collecting materials relative to the history of the northern nations. His valuable Histories of Denmark form 16 vols. 8vo. Died, 1796.

SUIDAS, a Greek writer, supposed to have lived in the tenth century, was the compiler of a lexicon, which is valuable for the fragments it contains of many lost works, and the information it gives respecting the authors.

SULLIVAN, SIR RICHARD JOSEPH, bart., was born in Ireland, and sent out to India early in life, through the patronage of his relation, Laurence Sullivan, at that time chairman of the East India Company. On his return he made a tour through Ireland, Scotland, and Wales; of which he gave an account in a series of letters, in 3 vols. He also wrote an "Analysis of the Political History of India;" "Philosophical Rhapsodies; being Fragments of Akber of Betla," &c.; but his most important work was "A View of Nature, in Letters to a Traveller among the Alps," 6 vols. He was returned M.P. for New Romney, in 1790, and for Seaford, in 1803; was made a baronet in 1804; and died in 1808.

SULLIVAN, JOHN, an American general, who served with reputation in the republican army at the battles of Brandywine and Germantown, in 1777 and 1778; and subsequently against the Indians; but was deprived of his command, on a charge of peculation, and lived in retirement till 1788, when he became a member of the congress, and was afterwards judge of New Hampshire. Born, 1741; died, 1795.

SULLIVAN, JAMES, brother of the preceding, was successively justice, attorney-general, and governor of the province of Massachusetts. He was for many years president of the Historical Society of Massachusetts; and was the author of "Observations on the Government of the United States of America;" a "Dissertation on the Constitutional Liberty of the Press," &c. Died, 1808.

SULLY, MAXIMILIAN DE BETHUNE, duke of, a celebrated French statesman and warrior, was born at the castle of Rosny, in 1559, and educated in the Protestant faith. At an early age he was placed about the person of the king of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV., to whom he ever continued to be firmly attached. While at Paris with the prince, he narrowly escaped being one of the victims of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, having been preserved by the president of the college of Burgundy, who concealed him for three days. In the service of the young king of Navarre, the baron de Rosny, as he was then styled, distinguished himself, on several occasions, by a bravery approaching to rashness. But his abilities as a diplomatist and financier were no less remarkable. In 1606, he concluded a treaty with the Swiss, for a supply of 20,000 troops for his master's service; in 1597 he was placed at the head of the department of finance; and two years after, he was declared superintendent. About the same time he also negotiated the marriage of Henry with Mary de' Medici. In his embassy to England, after the death of queen Elizabeth, he displayed great penetration and address, and concluded a treaty with James I., advantageous to the interests of both countries. In addition to his other offices, he was appointed grand surveyor of France, grand master of the artillery, governor of the Bastille, and superintendant of fortifications throughout the kingdom. His labours, as minister of finance, were attended with the happiest success; and the revenues of the government, which had been reduced to a state of complete dilapidation, by the combined effect of civil anarchy and open warfare, were by his care restored to order, regularity, and affluence. With a revenue of thirty-five millions, he paid off, in ten years, a debt of two hundred millions, besides laying up thirty-five millions. Though frequently thwarted in his purposes by the rapacity of the courtiers and mistresses of the monarch, he nobly pursued his career, ever distinguishing himself as the zealous friend of his country, and not the temporizing minister of his master. His industry was unwearied. He rose every morning at four o'clock, and, after dedicating some time to business, he gave audience to all who solicited admission to him, without distinction of persons. After his return from his mission to England, he was made governor of Poitou, and grand master of the ports and harbours of Provence; and the territory of Sully sur Loire was erected into a duchy in his favour, in 1606. After the death of Henry IV., Sully retired from public affairs, and he died in 1641. His "Memoirs," which are highly interesting, have been translated into English, by Mrs. Charlotte Lennox, and form 8 vols.

SULPICIA, a Latin poetess, who was the wife of Calenus, a Roman knight, and flourished about A.D. 90. She obtained the name of the Roman Sappho, and appears to have merited it, if we may take the opinion of Martial on her poem on Conjugal Love.

SULPICIOUS GALLUS, one of the earliest of the Roman astronomers. Being in the army of Paulus Æmilius, in Greece, during the year 168 B.C., his skill enabled him to discover that an eclipse of the moon would happen on the night previous to the day fixed for giving battle to Perseus, king of Macedon, and thus preventing the panic by which the soldiers would have otherwise been seized. He afterwards filled the office of consul.

SULPICIOUS SEVERUS, an ecclesiastical historian, of the fifth century. He wrote the "Life of St. Martin of Tours;" and an "Abridgment of Ecclesiastical History."

SULZER, an ingenious Swiss writer, was born in the canton of Zurich, in 1720; and became professor of mathematics at the royal college of Berlin. He was the author of "Moral Contemplations of the Works of Nature;" an "Account of a Journey in the Alps;" and "The Universal Theory, or Dictionary of the Fine Arts," 2 vols.

SUMOROKOF, ALEXANDER, a Russian poet and dramatist, the son of a general officer, was born at Moscow in 1727. He was educated in the seminary of cadets at Petersburg; and while a student, wrote a tragedy, called "Koref," which was acted by his school-fellows, and afterwards performed in the presence of the court, with such applause, as encouraged the author to proceed in his dramatic career. Besides tragedies and comedies, he wrote odes, idyls, fables, satires, and other poems; together with a few works on the history of Russia. He was created a counsellor of state, and honoured with other marks of distinction. Died, 1777.

SUTCLIFFE, MATTHEW, an English divine, was born in Devonshire, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. He was admitted a civilian in 1582; but took orders, and became dean of Exeter. He founded a singular college at Chelsea, the fellows of which institution were to be employed in writing the annals of their times, and in combating the errors of popery and pelagianism. Sutcliffe was himself the first provost; but the establishment fell to decay, and became at last an asylum for invalid soldiers, being a part of the one at present existing there. He was an eminent controversialist, and wrote numerous tracts against the Catholic propagandists. Died, 1629.

SUTTON, THOMAS, the founder of the Charter-house, was a wealthy English merchant of the age of Elizabeth. He was born in 1532, at Knaith, in Lincolnshire; received his education at Eton and Cambridge, and afterwards studied at Lincoln's Inn. On becoming secretary to the earl of Warwick, he was made master of the ordnance at Berwick, where he signalized himself during the rebellion raised by the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland. On account of his services at that period, he obtained a patent for the office of master general of the ordnance in the north, for life. In 1573 he commanded one of the batteries, which compelled the castle of Edinburgh to surrender to the English. While thus employed, he was singularly fortunate in a purchase which he made of two valuable manors from the bishop of Durham, on which a vein of coal was subsequently discovered, and laid the foundation of the immense riches which afterwards flowed in upon him. At the time of the Spanish armada he completely equipped a ship of war at his own expense, called by his own name, and sent to join the fleet under Drake. His personal expenditure was on a princely style, till the death of his wife, in 1602, threw him into a degree of melancholy, which occasioned a total change in his mode of living; and he then resolved to dedicate his vast wealth to the benefit of his fellow-creatures. He accordingly purchased from the earl of Suffolk the dissolved monastery of the Chartreux, called Howard-house, and there founded a munificent institution, under the name of the Charter-house; but the founder scarcely lived to witness the completion of his noble establishment. He died in 1611, and his remains, which at first were deposited in Christchurch, Newgate-street, were afterwards removed to a vault prepared for them in the chapel of the Charter-house.

PRIVILEGE IS A CONVENIENT DISGUISE FOR COURT-INTRIGUE: IT IS ACHILLES IN THE DRESS OF A WOMAN, OR BRUTUS ACTING THE FOOL.

ALEXIS WASILIEWITSCH, (count Rimnisky, prince of Italsky), a celebrated Russian field-marshal, was born in 1730, at Suskol, in the Ukraine, and educated at the cadet school of St. Petersburg. He entered the army as a private soldier; distinguished himself during the seven years' war; and after twenty years service, was raised to the command of a regiment. In 1768 he obtained the rank of brigadier-general, and served several campaigns in Poland, receiving, in reward for his courage and conduct, the crosses of three Russian orders of knighthood. In 1773 he was appointed to the command of a division of the troops under count Romanzoff, and completely defeated a portion of the Turkish army at Turtukay, killing several of the enemy with his own hand. Crossing the Danube, he afterwards, in conjunction with the force under Kamensky, routed the army of the Turks with great slaughter, and captured the whole of their artillery. In 1783 he reduced the Budziac Tartars under the Russian yoke. At Oczakow and Fockzami his daring valour was equally displayed; and, in September, 1790, the Austrian troops, under the prince of Saxe-Coburg, being surrounded, on the banks of the Rymnik, by 100,000 Turks, owed their preservation to his timely arrival with 10,000 Russians, who not only rescued them from a destruction that appeared inevitable, but occasioned the utter overthrow of the enemy. The next, and most sanguinary of his actions, was the storming of Ismail. In 1790, this strongly fortified town had resisted all attempts to reduce it for a period of seven months, when Suwarrow received pre-emptory orders from prince Potemkin, to take it without delay, and pledged himself to execute the task assigned him in three days. Of the sacking of the place on the third, and the indiscriminate massacre of 40,000 of its inhabitants, of every age and sex, the accounts of the period give the most revolting reports. The announcement of his bloody triumph was made by the general, who affected a Spartan brevity in his despatches, in the words "Glory to God! Ismail is ours." Peace being proclaimed, the empress had leisure to mature her designs against the devoted kingdom of Poland; and Suwarrow was selected as a fit instrument to carry them into execution. He marched, accordingly, at the head of his troops, to Warsaw, destroying about 20,000 Poles in his way, and ending a campaign of which the unprincipled partition of the country was the result. On this occasion, he received a field-marshal's baton, and an estate in the dominions which he had contributed to annex to the Russian crown. The last and most celebrated of his actions was his campaign in Italy in 1796, when his courage and genius for a while repaired the disasters of the allied forces. Paul gave him the command of the Russian forces destined to act with the Austrians, and the emperor of Germany created him field-marshal, and commander-in-chief of the Austrian troops in Italy. After gaining several brilliant victories, and driving the French from all the towns and fortresses of Upper Italy, the plan of operations was changed, and the expected reinforcements from Austria did not arrive. The Russian hero, however, effected a masterly retreat from Switzerland, and, entering Germany, marched to Russia by order of his sovereign. For his service in this campaign he was created a prince, by the title of Italsky. But he was treated by Paul with great ingratitude, which deeply affected his spirits; and he died, of chagrin, in 1800.

SWAMMERDAM, JOHN, a celebrated naturalist and anatomist, was born at Amsterdam, in 1637; took his medical degree at Leyden, but applied himself chiefly to anatomy and entomology; formed a very valuable cabinet of natural history; and excelled in the art of injecting the vessels of dissected bodies with wax, and in anatomizing the minutest parts of insects. He was the author of a "General History of Insects;" a "History of the Ephemera;" and "De Fabrica Uteri Muliebris." Rendered hypochondriacal by intensity of study and other causes, he became totally unfit for society, in which state he received impressions from the mysticism of Antonie Bourignon, whom he followed to Holstein. He afterwards returned to Amsterdam, where he died, in 1680.

SWEDENBORG, EMANUEL, a celebrated philosophical enthusiast of the 18th century, who was greatly distinguished for his valuable contributions to science, but who is now known chiefly as the founder of a sect called the New Jerusalem church. He was born at Stockholm, in 1668, and educated under the care of his father, bishop of West Gothland, in the doctrines of Lutheranism. After pursuing his studies in the university of Upsal, and giving proofs of very superior talents, he went on his travels, and visited the universities of England, Holland, France, and Germany. On his return he was appointed assessor extraordinary to the college of mines, and in 1719 he was ennobled, upon which occasion his name was changed from Swedenborg to Swedenborg. In 1743 he imbibed a belief that he was admitted to an intercourse with the invisible world, and this belief he retained till his death. In 1747 he resigned his office in the mining college; resided alternately in Sweden and England; and published several theological works of a very singular and mysterious character, which attracted much notice, and were read with the deepest veneration by his followers. Although it was generally considered that Swedenborg laboured under a delusion on this subject, he appeared to have no other mental aberration; and he was always regarded as a learned and pious man. The sect is now become numerous, and its members are perhaps as pure in morals and as inoffensive as any into which the Christian church is divided. He died in 1772.

SWIFT, Dr. JONATHAN, dean of St. Patrick's, a celebrated political, satirical, and miscellaneous writer, was born at Dublin, in 1667. Of a life so various, and so full of business as Swift's, it is difficult to select any part, consistent with the limits of this work, that would not rather excite curiosity than gratify it; and this, indeed, in the course of our present labours, we have frequently had reason to regret before. nathan Swift was the grandson of Thomas Swift, vicar of Goodrich, in Herefordshire, who married Elizabeth Dryden, aunt of the poet, and by her had six sons. One of these sons, named Jonathan, who was bred an attorney, had married before he went to reside in Ireland; and, dying soon after, left his widow pregnant. In this state she went to live with her brother-in-law, Godwin Swift, an attorney at Dublin, where she gave birth to the subject of this article. When Mrs. Swift returned to her friends in Leicestershire, she left this child to the care of his uncle, who sent him first to the school of Kilkenny, and next to Trinity-college, Dublin, where, applying himself to history and poetry, to the neglect of academical pursuits, especially mathematics, he was at the end of four years refused the degree of B.A., and even at the end of seven years he was only admitted speciall gratia. In 1688 he lost his uncle, and being left without support, he came to England, where he waited on Sir William Temple, who being related to Swift's mother by marriage, received him with kindness, and made him his companion. During his residence with that celebrated statesman, he had frequent interviews with king William, who offered him a troop of horse, which he declined, his thoughts being directed to the church. After some time, he quarrelled with his patron, and went to Ireland, where he took orders, and obtained a prebend in the diocese of Connor. But he soon returned to Sir William Temple, who, sinking under age and infirmities, required his company more than ever. During the few remaining years of that statesman's life, they therefore remained together; and, on his death, Swift found himself benefited by a pecuniary legacy and the bequest of his papers. He next accompanied lord Berkeley, one of the lords justices, to Ireland, as chaplain, and obtained from him the livings of Laracor and Rathbigan, on the former of which he went to reside. During his residence there, he invited to Ireland Miss Johnson, the lady whom he has rendered celebrated by the name of Stella, and who was the daughter of Sir William Temple's steward. She was accompanied by a Mrs. Dingley; and the two ladies lived in the neighbourhood when Swift was at home, and at the parsonage-house during his absence; which mysterious connexion lasted till her death. In 1701 he took his doctor's degree, and entered on the arena of public life as a political pamphleteer. He also published, though anonymously, his eccentric and humorous "Tale of a Tub," and the "Battle of the Books." On the accession of queen Anne he visited England, where he lived during a great part of that reign, and distinguished himself as a powerful writer on the side of the Tories. Having become intimate with Harley and Bolingbroke, he exerted himself strenuously in behalf of their party, taking a leading share in the famous Tory periodical, entitled "The Examiner," while with his battery of pamphlets and pasquinades, always replete with bitter sarcasm or bold invective, he kept up a constant and gallant fire on their political adversaries. But though immersed in politics, he did not neglect general literature. In 1711 he published a "Proposal for correcting, improving, and ascertaining the English Tongue," in a letter to the earl of Oxford, the object of which was to establish an institution to secure the purity of the language. A bishopric in England was the grand object of his ambition; but archbishop Sharpe, on the ground, it is said, of his "Tale of a Tub," having infused into the mind of queen Anne suspicions of his orthodoxy, the only preferment his ministerial friends could give him, was the Irish deanery of St. Patrick's, to which he was presented in 1713. He accordingly, though by no means willingly, returned to Dublin, where he attended to his ecclesiastical functions, and made some important reforms in the chapter of St. Patrick's. In 1716 he was privately married to Miss Johnson; but the ceremony was attended with no acknowledgment which could gratify the feelings of the victim of his pride and cruelty. The ascendancy which he acquired over Miss Hester Vanhomrigh, another accomplished female, was attended with circumstances still more censurable. He became acquainted with this lady in London, in 1712; and as she possessed, with a large fortune, a taste for literature, Swift took pleasure in affording her instruction. The pupil became enamoured of her tutor, and even proposed marriage to him; but being probably at that time engaged to Stella, he avoided giving her a decisive answer. This affair terminated fatally; for, ultimately discovering his secret union with Stella, the unfortunate lady never recovered the shock, and died in fourteen months after, in 1723. It was about this period that he made his first great efforts to better the condition of Ireland. He published a "Proposal for the universal Use of Irish Manufactures," which rendered him highly popular; and when his celebrated "Letters" appeared, in which he so ably exposed the job of Wood's patent for a supply of copper coinage, he became the idol of the Irish people. Soon after this, he wrote that admirable compound of satiric humour, "Gulliver's Travels;" and the next event worthy of record, is the death of his much-injured Stella. And now the fate which he had often apprehended, overtook him; the faculties of his mind decayed before his body, and a gradual abolition of reason settled into absolute idiocy. After three years of mental suffering, he died in 1743, aged 77; having bequeathed the greatest part of his fortune to a hospital for lunatics and idiots. It would be useless now to enumerate his various writings; the most important are, "The Drapier's Letters;" "The Tale of a Tub;" and "Gulliver's Travels." From each and all of these, as well as from his domestic history, a tolerably correct estimate of his real character may be drawn—difficult though it be to delineate a character in which the best and worst of human passions are so strangely blended.

SWIFT, DEANE, a relation of the preceding, was descended, by the mother's side, from admiral Deane, a naval officer in the time of Cromwell. He was the author of "An Essay on the Life, Writings, and Character of Dr. Jonathan Swift;" and died in 1743.

SWINBURNE, a learned traveller, born of a respectable Catholic family in Northumberland. He was educated on the continent; and afterwards made a tour throughout the greater part of the south of Europe; the result of which he published as "Travels in Spain," and "Travels in the Two Sicilies." Died, 1803.

SWINDEN, THOMAS, an English divine, who became rector of Cuxton, in Kent, where he wrote an extraordinary book, entitled "An Enquiry into the Nature and Place of Hell." Died, 1720.

SWINDEN, JOHN HENRY VAN, professor of philosophy, logic, and metaphysics at Franeker, and afterwards of mathematics and astronomy at Amsterdam, was born at the Hague, in 1746. In 1802 he was nominated a correspondent of the French Institute: he was also a member of the Executive Directory, under the Batavian republic, and counsellor of state in the service of the king of the Netherlands. He was the author of several scientific works; and died in 1823.

SWINTON, JOHN, a divine and antiquary, was born in 1703, at Berton, in Cheshire; was educated at Wadham college, Oxford; became chaplain to the English factory at Leghorn; and on his return was elected keeper of the university records. He contributed largely to the Universal History, and published several dissertations on Phœnician and other antiquities. Died, 1777.

SYBRECHT, JOHN, an eminent landscape painter, born at Antwerp, in 1630; died in London, where he had many years resided, in 1703.

SYDENHAM, THOMAS, an eminent physician, was born in 1624, at Winford Eagle, in Dorsetshire, and was educated at Wadham college, Oxford. After studying medicine at Montpellier, he returned and settled in Westminster, where he commenced practice, and attained a high reputation. He died in 1689. Dr. Sydenham's improvements, especially in the treatment of febrile diseases, form an era in the history of medicine; and his works are in the highest estimation.

SYDENHAM, FLOYER, an eminent Greek scholar, was born in 1710, and educated at Wadham college, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A. in 1734. He translated some of the works of Plato into English; but the want of patronage involved him in embarrassments; he was arrested and thrown into prison for a trifling debt due for his frugal meals; and there perished, in 1788. Such was the sympathy which his sad fate excited, that it gave rise to that excellent institution, the Literary Fund.

SYKES, ARTHUR ASHLEY, an English divine, was born in London about 1684, and educated at St. Paul's school, and Corpus Christi college, Cambridge. He held, successively, the livings of Godmersham, Dry Drayton, and Rayleigh; became a prebendary and chancellor of Salisbury cathedral; and ultimately obtained the deanery of St. Buryan, in Cornwall, and a prebend at Winchester. He died in 1736. Dr. Sykes was distinguished as an able controversialist in favour of the Hoadleyan or low church principles; and was also the author of "An Essay on the Truth of the Christian Religion," &c.

SYLLA, LUCIUS CORNELIUS, a celebrated Roman general and statesman, was descended from a branch of the once illustrious family of the Cornelli; passed his youth in dissipation; and having obtained wealth by the bequests of a courtesan and of his mother-in-law, he aspired to political distinction, and in 107 B.C. he was chosen quaestor. He served with reputation under Marius, in Africa, Pontus, and on various other occasions; and he rose to the consulship in the 49th year of his age. At its expiration he set sail for the East; and having landed in Thessaly, and received the submission of several Grecian cities, he besieged and took Athens, and slaughtered multitudes of its inhabitants. He then proceeded to Asia, and after repeatedly defeating Mithridates, he concluded a very advantageous treaty with that powerful enemy. During his three years' absence from Italy, his enemies had regained the superiority in Rome. Marius had been recalled; the blood of the friends of Sylla had been shed in torrents; he himself had been proscribed, and his property confiscated. Meanwhile Marius died; and as soon as Sylla returned with his victorious army, they entered Rome, and began the dreadful work of retaliation. At length, having glutted his vengeance by the murder or proscription of many thousand citizens, and the desolation of several Italian cities, he celebrated his bloody deeds by a triumph, exceeding in splendour any that preceded it, and caused himself to be named dictator, B.C. 81. He now ruled without restraint; repealed and made laws; abolished the tribuneship; added 300 knights to the senate, and admitted 10,000 slaves of persons proscribed to the rights of citizenship. Having governed the Roman world two years as dictator, he voluntarily laid down his power, and retired to private life. But resuming his early habits of debauchery, he was attacked with a disgusting disease, and he died, B.C. 78, aged 60.

SYLVESTER, JOSHUA, a quaint English poet, known in his day as the "silver-tongued Sylvester," was born in 1583; and died in Holland in 1618. He translated into English verse "Du Bartas's Divine Weeks and Works;" and, amongst other pieces, was the author of a satire against tobacco, entitled "Tobacco battered and the Pipes shattered," &c.

SYMES, MICHAEL, an English officer, who was sent as ambassador to the Burmese court, at Amerspoora, in 1785, and had the satisfaction of concluding an advantageous treaty of commerce with the Burmese emperor. On arriving in England, major Symes published the account of his "Embassy to the kingdom of Ava." He died, shortly after the disastrous retreat of Sir John Moore's army, from fatigue, being then colonel of the 66th regiment of infantry, Jan. 1809.

SYNESIUS of Cyrene, an ancient father and bishop of the Christian church, who flourished at the beginning of the 5th century. The works of Synesius, consisting of about 150 epistles on philosophical and polemical subjects, are in high esteem with the learned.

SYNCELLUS, GEORGE, a monk of Constantinople, who flourished A.D. 792. A "Chronography" of his exists, which is valuable as furnishing a knowledge of the dynasties of Egypt.

SYNGE, EDWARD, a pious prelate, was the son of Dr. Synges, bishop of Cork, and born there in 1669. He became archbishop of Tuam; and wrote several useful tracts on practical religion. Died, 1741.

SZABO, DAVID, a Transylvanian poet; author of a "Description of Rural Life," and other poems, and the translator of Milton's Paradise Lost and Virgil's Æneid. Born, 1739; died, 1819.

SZALKAI, ANTHONY VON, a Hungarian poet, who is regarded as the founder of the dramatic literature of his country. His "Pikkó Hertzeg" is the first regular piece composed in the Hungarian language; he also wrote a travesty of the Æneid. Died, 1804.

SZEGEDI, JOHN BAPTIST, a learned Jesuit, born at Eisenstadt, in 1699. He became, successively, rector, missionary, and almoner-general; and was distinguished as well by the purity of his life, as by his talents. His works chiefly relate to the laws and history of Hungary. He died in 1760.

T.

TABARI, ABU JA'AFAR MOHAMMED, a celebrated Arabian historian. He was well versed in the laws and customs of the Mahometans; and wrote a "History, or General Chronicle, from the Creation to the year 300 of the Hegira." He died at Bagdad in the year of the Hegira 310.

TABOUROT, STEPHEN, the Sieur des Accords, was born in 1549. He was generally known as king's proctor in the bailliage of Dijon; and wrote "Les Bigarrures et Touches du Seigneur des Accords," a collection of whimsical poems. Died, 1590.

TABRIZI, ABU ZACHARIAH YAHYA, or ESN ALKATHEB, was a celebrated Arabian critic and grammarian, who wrote commentaries on various Oriental authors; and enjoyed a high reputation as a teacher at Bagdad, where he died in 1109.

TACCA, PETER JAMES, a celebrated Italian sculptor, was a pupil of John Bologna. Two of his greatest works are the statue of Ferdinand III. grand duke of Tuscany, with four slaves chained at his feet, at Leghorn; and the equestrian figure of Philip IV. at Madrid. Died, 1640.

TACHARD, GUY, a French Jesuit, who accompanied the French ambassadors to Siam, as a missionary. In 1688 he returned to Europe after an absence of two years, but went again to India, and died in Bengal about 1694. His voyages, in 2 vols. were published at Paris, in 1698.

TACITUS, CAIUS CORNELIUS, a highly celebrated Roman historian, was the son of Cornelius Tacitus, procurator and governor of one of the provinces in Belgic Gaul, and born about the year 56. He early distinguished himself as a poet and an advocate; and in his twenty-first year married the daughter of Julius Agricola. In the seventh year of Domitian he became prætor; but soon after he left Rome; and during his absence Agricola died. In the short reign of Nerva, he succeeded Virginius Rufus as consul, A.D. 97, and delivered the funeral oration in honour of his predecessor. Under Trajan, Tacitus enjoyed great distinction, and lived on terms of friendship with the younger Pliny, in conjunction with whom he pleaded against Priscus, the pro-consul of Africa. It was at this period that he published the "History of Rome, from Galba to the Death of Domitian," part of which only has escaped the ravages of time. This work was followed by the "Annals," from the year of Rome 767 to the death of Nero in 821. He also wrote "The Life of Agricola;" "The Manners of the Germans;" and a "Dialogue on Oratory." No name stands higher for historical reputation than that of Tacitus; and his writings are regarded as a rich repository of political and philosophical aphorisms. The exact date of his death is not known, but it is generally believed to have taken place about A.D. 135.

TACITUS, MARCUS CLAUDIUS, a patriotic Roman emperor, elected to the imperial office on the death of Aurelian, A.D. 275, when in his 75th year. He was descended from the great historian above mentioned, and had been twice consul; but he reigned as emperor only six months, in which short space he displayed wisdom, vigour, and a just moderation.

of which were collected in one folio volume, and published after his death, in 1707.

TAFFI, ANDREA, an Italian artist, born at Florence in 1213. He introduced into Italy the art of designing in mosaic, which he learnt from some Greeks employed at Venice. Died, 1294.

TAGLIACOTZI, or TALIAECOTIUS, GASPARD, an eminent Italian surgeon, ludicrously alluded to by the author of Hadibras, was born at Bologna, in 1546, where he was for many years anatomical professor. He applied himself chiefly to curing wounds of the ears, lips, &c., but more particularly the nose. This, which has obtained the name of the Taliesion process, has both been performed and written on by Mr. Carpus and Mr. Travers. It appears, also, that the operation has long been practised in India. Died, 1609.

TALBERT, FRANCIS XAVIER, a French ecclesiastic, and the author of various "Elogies," was born at Besançon, in 1725. He obtained some preferment in the church, but lost it in the Revolution; removed to Poland; and died in 1803.

TALBOT, JOHN, lord, a famous warrior, was the second son of Sir Richard Talbot, of Goodrich castle, in Shropshire, and born in 1373. In the first year of Henry V., he was appointed lieutenant of Ireland, where he suppressed a rebellion, and brought the chief, Donald Macmurrough, to England. In 1490 he attended Henry V. to France, and was present with him at his two sieges and triumphant entry into Paris. In the next reign he laid siege to Orleans, where his name struck terror into the French soldiers; but the appearance of Joan of Arc turned the scale, and the English army retreated. The battle of Patay completed the disaster, and lord Talbot was made prisoner. At the end of three years and a half, he was exchanged; and again led the English to victory. He took a number of strong places, and carried his arms to the walls of Paris, for which he was created earl of Shrewsbury, and raised to the dignity of a marshal of France. On his return from France, he was again sent to Ireland, and the earldom of Wexford and Waterford were added to his honours. He again sought fame on French ground; was made lieutenant-general of Aquitaine; reduced several towns to obedience; and was marching to the relief of Châtillon, when his usual good fortune forsook him, and he and his son fell on the field of battle, July 30, 1453. The English on this occasion were wholly routed, and their expulsion from France soon followed.

TALBOT, CHARLES, earl, afterwards duke of Shrewsbury, was descended from the above, and born in 1660. He was one of the first promoters of the Revolution; for which he was created a duke, and made lord chamberlain, viceroy of Ireland, and high treasurer. Died, 1717.

TALBOT, ROBERT, an English antiquary and divine, was born at Thorp, in Northamptonshire; was educated at Oxford; obtained a prebend in Wells cathedral, in 1541; and died, treasurer of Norwich cathedral, in 1556. He paid great attention to the antiquities of his native country, and was the first English writer who illustrated the Itinerary of Antoninus, by a commentary and notes.

TALBOT, CHARLES, lord high chancellor of Great Britain, was the son of William Talbot, bishop of Durham, and was born in 1684. He was an excellent lawyer, and a man of high virtue and public integrity. Died, 1737.

TALBOT, CATHERINE, daughter of Edward Talbot, second son of the bishop of Durham, was born in 1730, and died in 1770. This lady was no less distinguished by her amiable life than by her talents; and was the author of "Reflections on the Seven Days of the Week," "Essays on Various Subjects," Letters, Dialogues, and Poems.

TALIESIN, termed PEN BIRDD, or the Chief of the Bards, is regarded as the most eminent of the ancient British poets. He lived in the middle of the sixth century; and his name has been handed down to posterity in conjunction with the two Merlins, under the appellation of the three principal Christian bards.

TALLARD, CAMILLE D'HOUTUN, duke de, a celebrated marshal of France, was born in 1652. After having distinguished himself under Turenne, he was, in 1697, sent ambassador to England, to negotiate concerning the succession to the crown of Spain on the death of Charles II. War breaking out in 1702, he was honoured with a marshal's staff; and after he had defeated the imperialists before Landau, and the town had capitulated, he announced his success to Louis XIV. in the following terms: "I have taken more standards than your majesty has lost soldiers." He was afterwards opposed to the duke of Marlborough, and taken prisoner at the battle of Hochstet; on which occasion he said to the duke, "Your Grace has beaten the finest troops in Europe." The duke replied, "You will except, I hope, those who defeated them." Marshal Tallard remained in England till 1712, when he returned to Paris, and was created a duke. In 1730 he was made secretary of state; and died in 1728.

TALLIEN, one of the most prominent characters in the French Revolution, was born at Paris, in 1769, and was the son of the maître-d'hôtel to the marquis de Bercy, to whom he was indebted for his education. Previously to the Revolution he had been clerk to an attorney; but he commenced his political career as secretary to the deputy Broustaret, and neglected no means to bring himself into notice as the violent opponent of the king and his ministers, and thereby gradually acquired considerable influence. He was deeply concerned in the terrible commotions of the 10th of August, 1793; and was at that time the constant advocate for violent measures. He strongly urged the immediate trial of Louis XVI., added new charges to the accusation against him; voted for his death; and on the day of his execution he was president of the Convention. At length, however, after taking a part in most of the sanguinary proceedings which occurred during the ascendancy of Robespierre, he became more moderate, and it was mainly to his courage and eloquence that the downfall of the tyrant was effected. He had formed an attachment for Madame de Fontenai, a lady of great personal charms, whose family name was Cabarus; but the connexion had been broken off, and she was thrown into a dungeon by Robespierre. The tyrant, being afraid of Tallien, offered her life and liberty if she would betray him. But, though her lover had been faithless, she rejected the proposal; and sent privately this note to Tallien: "The minister of police has announced to me that to-morrow I am to appear at the tribunal, that is to say, that I am to ascend the scaffold. I dreamt last night that Robespierre was no more; and that my prison doors were opened. A brave man might have realized this dream; but, thanks to your cowardice, no one remains capable of its accomplishment." Tallien answered, "Be as prudent as I shall prove brave; and, above all, be tranquil." The next day he hurried to the tribune, and, after an animated picture of the atrocities which had taken place, and which he ascribed to Robespierre, he suddenly turned to the bust of Brutus, and invoking the genius of the Roman patriot, he drew a dagger from his bosom, and swore that he would bury it in the tyrant's heart, if the representatives of the people had not courage to order his immediate arrest. The moment was critical; the fate of Tallien hung on a thread; and the assembly joined him, and the miscreant perished on the scaffold. Tallien, who now married Madame de Fontenai, continued to be an active member of the legislature till 1798, when he accompanied Buonaparte to Egypt, as one of the literati attached to the expedition; but after Buonaparte left that country, Menou obliged him to return also; and the vessel in which he sailed being captured by the English, he was taken to London. On revisiting his native country, he was taken but little notice of by Buonaparte; but he eventually obtained the office of French consul at Allicant. Died, 1820.

TALLIS, THOMAS, a celebrated English musician of the 16th century. He filled the situation of organist of the chapel royal under Henry VIII., as well as under his three immediate successors; and parts of his composition are still used in our cathedrals. Died, 1585.

TALMA, FRANÇOIS JOSEPH, the most eminent tragic actor France ever produced, was born at Paris, in 1763, but spent his childhood in Flanders and England, where his father was a dentist. When nine years of age he was sent to Paris to be educated; became passionately fond of the drama; and, returning to England, formed one of an amateur French company, which performed at Hanover-square rooms; and was at one time on the point of appearing on the boards of Drury-lane theatre, to which he was strongly urged by several distinguished persons. Circumstances, however, led him to Paris, where he entered the royal school for declamation, and in 1787 made his debut at the Théâtre Français, in the character of Seide, in Voltaire's "Mahomet." He was received with applause, and from that moment devoted himself with zeal and perseverance to the study of his art. He sought the society of distinguished literati and artists; studied history for the purpose of becoming acquainted with the manners and customs of nations, and the characters of remarkable individuals; and made himself master of the attitudes, costumes, expression, and drapery of the ancient statues. For many years he continued at the summit of his profession, and acquired by it a handsome fortune. He died in 1826.

TALMONT, DE LA TRIMOILLE, prince de, a French royalist officer in the war of La Vendée. He distinguished himself by his courage on many occasions, but was ultimately taken prisoner, and executed in front of his own castle of Laval, in 1793.

TAMBRONI, JOSEPH, an Italian poet and historian, born at Bologna, in 1773. In 1809 he was appointed consul at Leghorn, and afterwards at Rome. He wrote "Compendio delle Storie di Polonia," &c. Died, 1834.—His sister, CLOTILDA, was noted for her acquaintance with Greek literature, and in 1794 the Greek professorship at Bologna was bestowed on her. Died, 1817.

TAMERLANE, or TIMOUR, one of the most celebrated of the Oriental conquerors, was born in 1333, at Kernch, in the territory of the ancient Sogdiana, and early in life displayed extraordinary courage and enterprise. Having gained a number of followers of a similar disposition, he made himself master of Balk, the capital of Khorasan; after which he made an easy conquest of the province of Candahar. He next subdued the whole of ancient Persia, and then took Bagdad. Flushed with his success, he marched into India, where he took Delhi, the capital, and thus gained possession of immense treasures. But while he was engaged in this expedition, Bagdad revolted, on which he hastened back, delivered the city up to pillage, and put to death above 80,000 persons. He also invaded Syria, and took Damascus. In this splendid career the Greek emperor and some inferior princes implored his assistance against Bajazet, emperor of the Turks, whom he marched against, and after a battle of three days the Turkish emperor was defeated and taken prisoner. Tamerlane fixed the seat of his vast empire at Samarcand, where he received the homage of numerous sovereigns, and among the rest the ambassadors of the emperor Manuel Paleologus, and Henry III. king of Castile. He died in 1405. Tamerlane conducted his government alone, and without favourites, but was in the highest degree fierce and fanatical in his religion; and, although so conquests were ever attended with greater cruelty, devastation, and waste of human life, he affected the title of benefactor to mankind. Happily, his ambition was too gigantic for its consequences to last, and his dominions rapidly became divided as before.

gade in the expedition against Ireland, in August, 1796, under general Rey. He was afterwards taken at Hamburgh, and being brought to Ireland, was tried and convicted as a traitor. He was, however, allowed to retire to France, and died at Bourdeaux, in 1803.

TANNAHILL, ROBERT, a Scottish poet, was born at Paisley, in 1774, and bred a weaver. He read the works of Burns with enthusiasm, and, like many more of his countrymen, he burned to emulate him; and though he fell immeasurably short of his model, he produced some very delightful songs, and other lyric effusions. Died, 1810.

TANNER, THOMAS, a learned prelate, was born at Market Lavington, in Wiltshire, in 1674; was educated at Oxford; and ultimately reached the episcopal bench, as bishop of St. Asaph's. He wrote "Notitia Monastica, or an Account of all the Religious Houses in England and Wales;" "Bibliotheca Britannico-Hibernica," and contributed to the last edition of Wood's Athenæ Oxoniensis. Died, 1735.

TANSILLO, LUIGI, an Italian poet, born about 1510. Having composed some poems of a licentious character, pope Paul V. placed all his works in the Index Purgatorius, or list of prohibited books; upon which the poet made the best reparation in his power by writing a devout poem; and this had the desired effect. He was also the author of sonnets, songs, some comedies, and "The Nurse," which has been translated into English by Mr. Roscoe. He died, in 1568, judge of Gaeta.

TARLETON, RICHARD, a celebrated actor and jester, was born at Conover, in Shropshire. He was the author of a dramatic performance, called "The Seven Deadly Sins;" and many of his witticisms have been printed in different jest-books. Died, 1580.

TARQUINIUS, surnamed PRISCUS, or TARQUIN the ELDER, fifth king of Rome. Was the son of Greek parents, and born in the town of Tarquinii, in Etruria. His name was Lucumon Demaratus, which he changed on going to Rome, by the advice of his wife Tancquil. He had, in the course of a long and prosperous reign, reached his eightieth year, when he was assassinated by the sons of his predecessor, B.C. 578.

TARQUINIUS, surnamed SUPERBUS, or TARQUIN the PROUD, king of Rome, was a tyrant and usurper, who rendered himself odious to the Romans by his pride and cruelty. His son, Sextus Tarquinius, having ravished Lucretia, occasioned that well-known revolution, which put an end to the monarchy, and established the republic of Rome.

TARTINI, GIUSEPPE, an excellent Italian musician and composer, was born in 1692, at Pirano, in Istria. He was sent to study the law at Padua; but having married without the consent of his parents, they discarded him, and he became a player on the violin. A singular story is told respecting one of his most celebrated compositions. One night he dreamed that he had made a compact with the devil, and bound himself to his service. To ascertain the musical abilities of his associate, he gave him his violin, and desired him to play him a solo, which Satan executed in so masterly a manner, that Tartini, awaking in the ecstasy which it produced, and seizing his instrument, endeavoured to recall the delicious sounds. His efforts were so far effectual as to produce the piece generally admired under the name of the "Devil's Sonata." He held the situation of leader of the orchestra at the cathedral of St. Anthony, at Padua; and died in 1770. Besides his numerous musical compositions, Tartini wrote several treatises on the science.

TARTAGLIA, NICHOLAS, an able geometrical, was a native of Venice. He wrote a "Treatise on Gunnery;" a "Commentary on Euclid;" &c. Died, 1537.

TASKER, WILLIAM, an English divine and poet, was born in Devonshire, and died in 1800. His principal works are, "Odes of Pindar and Horace, translated into English verse," 3 vols. 8vo.; "Ode to the Warlike Genius of Britain;" and "Letters on Physiognomy."

TASMAN, ABEL JANSSEN, a Dutch navigator and geographical discoverer in the 17th century, was employed on exploratory voyages by Van Dieman, the Dutch governor-general in the East, and made many important discoveries in Australia and the surrounding islands.

TASSIE, JAMES, an ingenious modeller, was born near Glasgow, and brought up as a stone-mason; but having acquired from Dr. Quin, a physician in Dublin, the art of imitating gems in coloured paste, he came to London, where, by dint of talent and perseverance, he obtained both fame and fortune. Died, 1790.

TASSO, BERNARDO, an Italian poet, born at Bergamo, in 1493. He was of a good family, and was successively in the service of the prince of Salerno and the dukes of Urbino and Mantua. His chief poem is "Amadis de Gaul," in a hundred cantos. Died, 1569.

TASSO, TORQUATO, son of the preceding, one of the most celebrated poets that Italy ever produced, was born at Sorrento, in 1544. His works show him to have been a philosopher, an orator, a logician, a critic, and a poet excelling in every kind of composition. His chief works are "Rinaldo," "Aminta," and "Gerusalemme Liberata," an epic poem in 34 books, which has been considered by able critics to be the richest and most finished poem since the age of Augustus. While he was at the court of Alphonso, duke of Ferrara, he incurred that prince's anger by his passion for the princess Leonora, of Este, his patron's sister; and being somewhat disordered in his intellects, he was ungenerously shut up in a madhouse for seven years, where he underwent the most illiberal treatment. The remonstrances of several Italian princes at length procured his release; and when cardinal Aldobrandini ascended the papal chair by the name of Clement VIII., he invited him to Rome; resolving to confer upon him the laureate crown in the capitol. While, however, the preparations were going TASSONI, ALEXANDER, an Italian poet, born at Modena, in 1563. His writings display a fund of genuine humour; and some of them, especially the mock heroic poem, entitled "Secchia Rapita," or the "Rape of the Bucket," are most highly esteemed by his countrymen. Died, 1635.

TATE, FRANCIS, an English lawyer in the reign of Elizabeth, who acquired great reputation as a Saxon scholar and antiquary. He was made a Welsh judge in the reign of James I.

TATE, NAHUM, a poet, was born in Dublin, in 1652, and was educated in the college of his native city. On coming to London he assisted Dryden in some of his works; and succeeded Shadwell as poet-laureat. He altered Shakspeare's play of Lear, and wrote several poems; but he is best known by the Version of the Psalms, which he executed in conjunction with Brady.

TATIAN of ASSYRIA, a writer in defence of the Christians of the primitive church, flourished A.D. 170.

TATIUS, king of the Sabines, who made war against the Romans, and by treachery gained possession of the capitol. He was murdered at Lavinium, A.C. 742.

TAUSEN, JOHN, styled the Danish Luther, was born in 1489. He had embraced the monastic life; but quitted the convent, and zealously promoted the doctrines of the Reformation. He ultimately became bishop of Ribe. Died, 1561.

TAUNTON, Sir W. E., was a native of Oxford, in which university he pursued his studies, and obtained the degree of M. A. In 1799 he was called to the bar, and afterwards succeeded Mr. Abbott (the late lord Colchester) as recorder of Oxford, and, in 1830, was appointed one of the judges of the Court of King's Bench. He died suddenly on the 11th of January, 1835, in the sixty-fourth year of his age.

TAVERNIER, JEAN BAPTISTE, a traveller, was born at Paris, in 1625. He went through Turkey, Persia, and the East Indies, six times, and died at Moscow in 1689. His Collection of Travels, in 6 vols. is greatly esteemed, and has been translated into English.

TAYLOR, JOHN, usually called the Water Poet, from his being a waterman, was born in Gloucestershire, about 1540. In 1596, he served in the fleet under the earl of Essex, and was present at the attack upon Cadiz. After his return, he plied on the Thames; and was for many years collector for the lieutenant of the Tower, of his fees on the wines imported into London. He also styled himself the king's water poet, and the queen's waterman. When the civil wars began, he retired to Oxford, where he kept a public-house; as he afterwards did near Long Acre. At this place he manifested his loyalty by assuming for a sign, the "Crown in Mourning," which proving offensive, he substituted his own portrait. In those days, when painters were less plentiful than at present, his "right merrie conceits" were doubtless very attractive, though they cut but a sorry figure, when contrasted with the witty effusions of the Magnus Apollo of our own times. Died, 1654.

TAYLOR, JEREMY, an eminently learned and pious prelate, was born in 1613, at Cambridge; and having entered into orders, attracted the notice of archbishop Laud, who made him his chaplain, and obtained for him the rectory of Uppingham. In 1642 he was created doctor of divinity at Oxford, at which time he was chaplain in ordinary to Charles I., whom he attended in some of his campaigns, and aided by several writings in defence of the church of England. After the parliament proved victorious, his living being sequestrated, he retired into Wales, where he was kindly received by the earl of Carbery, under whose protection he was allowed to exercise his ministry, and keep a school. In this obscure situation he wrote those copious and fervent discourses, whose fertility of composition, eloquence of expression, and comprehensiveness of thought, have rendered him one of the first writers in the English language. He was twice imprisoned by the republican government; but at the Restoration he was made bishop of Down and Connor, and vice-chancellor of Trinity college, Dublin. Among his numerous works are, the "Golden Grove, or Manual of Daily Prayers;" "Treatises on Holy Living and Dying;" "Doctor Dubitantium, or Rule of Conscience;" and "Liberty of Prophecyng," a work on behalf of toleration. He died in 1667.

TAYLOR, SILAS, an English antiquary, was born at Harley, in Shropshire, in 1624. On leaving Oxford university, he entered into the parliamentary army; and afterwards became sequestrator of the estates of the loyalists in Herefordshire; but conducted himself with moderation. At the restoration he was made keeper of the stores at Harwich. Died, 1678.

TAYLOR, BROOK, a celebrated mathematician and philosopher, was born at Edmonton, in Middlesex, in 1685. He published a variety of scientific treatises; and died in 1731.

TAYLOR, JOHN, an eminent Unitarian divine, was born in Lancashire, in 1694. He was educated at Whitehaven; and after officiating some years to a congregation at Norwich, he accepted the office of divinity tutor, at the newly founded academy of Warrington. His most important works are, the "Scripture Doctrine of Original Sin;" the "Scripture Doctrine of Atonement;" a "Hebrew Concordance;" and a "Sketch of Moral Philosophy." Died, 1761.

TAYLOR, JOHN, a divine and civilian, was born at Shrewsbury, in 1704. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, and proceeded to the degree of LL.D. In 1743 he became a member of Doctors' Commons; and two years afterwards was appointed chancellor of Lincoln; but in 1751 he entered into orders, was presented to the rectory of Lawford, in Essex, and became a canon residentiary of St. Paul's. Died, 1766.

in life gave evident indications of poetic talent. Her first publication, "The Beggar Boy," appeared in 1804; and from that time forward, she continued to publish, occasionally, miscellaneous pieces in verse. The principal of these are, "Original Poems for Infant Minds," and "Essays in Rhyme on Morals and Manners." She also wrote a prose tale, entitled "Display," which met with much success. Died, 1823.

TAYLOR, THOMAS, a learned Grecian, commonly termed the Platonist, was born in 1758, and placed, at nine years of age, at St. Paul's school, with a view to orders; but he changed his mind when fifteen, and went to a relation, an officer at the port of Sheerness. There a celebrated Dissenter instructed him in the rudiments of Latin and Greek, and he applied himself with indefatigable ardour to the study of Greek, especially the works of the Platonic sophists. Having contracted an early love marriage, he was compelled to become under usher in a school, and subsequently, clerk to a banker, for subsistence; but he still found time to pursue his early studies. He afterwards gave public lectures in Greek, and on the Platonic writers, which introduced him to the favour of the duke of Norfolk, who furnished the funds for his great work, the excellent translation of Plato. To a mind constituted like that of Mr. Taylor's, no diction could be too obscure, no theory too speculative, no doctrine too recondite; his whole course of reading nourished his inherent love of mysticism and metaphysical subtlety. The pure philosophy of the academic schools and the wild reveries of cabalistic sects, each in their turns engaged his attention, and received his tribute of admiration. Popular tastes and feelings, he altogether disregarded; but lived, as it were, among the sages of antiquity, and propagated their tenets with all the ardour of a sincere votary. His translations are very voluminous: the most important are the works of Aristotle, Plato, and Pausanias. Mr. Taylor was assistant secretary to the Society of Arts; the salary for which, and a pension of 100*l.* per annum generously settled on him by his friend Mr. W. Meredith, enabled him to pass his latter days in comfort. He died in 1835, aged 77.

TCHEOU KONG, a Chinese sage and legislator, flourished eleven centuries before the Christian era, and was equally distinguished as a statesman, a warrior, a poet, and a philosopher.

TCHING TCHING KONG, a noted Chinese admiral in the 17th century, known in Europe by the name of Koxinga. His father having fallen into the hands of the Manchou Tartars, Tching Kong swore implacable vengeance against the insidious invaders; and after attacking their coasts, and committing great cruelties on the prisoners whom he took in battle, he established himself on the island of Formosa, and made a treaty with the English, with a view to their aid against the Manchous. He died in 1670; and Formosa was reconquered in 1683.

TEISSIER, ANTOINE, a learned French advocate, born at Montpellier, in 1632.

Being a Protestant, he was forced by the revocation of the edict of Nantes, to emigrate; and became historiographer to the Prussian court. He wrote some very valuable works, viz., "The Lives of Illustrious Princes;" "On the Social Duties of Man;" "Instructions, Moral and Political," &c. Died, 1715.

TEKELI, EMERIC, count DE, a Hungarian nobleman, was born in 1658, and took the command of his countrymen in their struggle to throw off the yoke of Austria. He defeated the Imperialists in several battles; but, after many vicissitudes, he was compelled to seek an asylum in Turkey, and died at Constantinople, in 1705.

TELL, WILLIAM, a renowned champion in the cause of Swiss liberty, was a native of Burglen, in the canton of Uri. He was distinguished by his skill in archery, his strength, and courage. The tyrannical despotism of the Austrian governor of Switzerland, Herman Gesler, was intolerable; he pushed his insolence so far, as to require the Swiss to uncover their heads before his hat (as an emblem of his sovereignty), and condemned Tell, who refused to comply with this mandate, to shoot an apple from the head of his own son. Tell was successful in his attempt, but confessed that a second arrow, which he bore about his person, was intended, in case he had failed, for the punishment of the tyrant, and was therefore retained prisoner. While he was crossing the lake of the Four Cantons, or lake of Lucerne, in the same boat with Gesler, a violent storm threatened the destruction of the skiff. Tell, as the most vigorous and skilful helmsman, was set free; and he conducted the boat successfully to the shore, but seized the opportunity to spring upon a rock, pushing off the barque. He had fortunately taken his bow with him; and when the governor finally escaped the storm, and reached the shore, Tell shot him dead on the road to Kussnacht. This event was the signal for a general rising, and a most obstinate war between the Swiss and Austrians, which was not brought to a close until 1499. Tell is supposed to have lost his life during an inundation in 1350. This is the story which has been handed down; but some have disputed it. However, it is certain that Tell contributed to emancipate his country; and there are many local customs referring to the events here related, which render the tradition probable.—The memorable event above described is said to have happened on the 7th of November, 1307; and the citizens having chosen for their leaders three gentlemen of approved courage and abilities, namely, Werner of Schwitz, Walter Furst of Uri, and Arnold Melchthal of Unterwalden, they secretly agreed together that they should surprise and demolish the castles in which the imperial governors resided. This resolution being effected, these three places joined again in a league for ten years, which gave birth to the Helvetic confederacy.

TELLIER, MICHAEL, a distinguished Jesuit, was born in Normandy in 1643. He became confessor to Louis XIV.; and procured from the pope the celebrated constitution called Unigenitus; but in the next reign he was banished to La Flèche, where he died in 1719. He was a violent bigot, though a man of regular morals; and much of the odium which fell on the society of St. Ignatius, may be attributed to his imprudent zeal.

TEMPELHOF, GEORGE FREDERIC, a German officer; author of "The Prussian Bombardier;" "The Elements of Military Tactics;" "the History of the Seven Years' War," &c. In the beginning of the revolutionary war with France, he had the command of all the Prussian artillery; and in 1802, he received the order of the red eagle from Frederick William III., who nominated him lieutenant-general and military tutor to the young princes, his brothers. Died, 1807.

TEMPESTA, ANTONIO, a painter, was born at Florence, in 1555. He was a disciple of Strada; and excelled in landscapes, animals, and battles. Died, 1630.

TEMPESTA, PETER, whose real name was MOLYN, but who received the soubriquet of Tempesta, from his frequent delineation of storms and shipwrecks, was a native of Haerlem. He went to Rome, and on changing his religion was made a chevalier; but was condemned to be hanged for the murder of his wife, which sentence was changed to perpetual imprisonment. After remaining in confinement sixteen years, he effected his escape. Died, 1701.

TEMPLE, SIR WILLIAM, provost of Trinity college, Dublin, had been secretary to Sir Philip Sidney, who died in his arms. He was afterwards knighted, and made a master of chancery. Died, 1626.

TEMPLE, SIR JOHN, son of the preceding, was born in London, and educated under his father at Dublin. He studied the law, and became master of the rolls, and a privy councillor in Ireland in the reign of Charles II. Sir John wrote, from his own observations, "A History of the Irish Rebellion in 1641."

TEMPLE, SIR WILLIAM, an eminent statesman, the son of Sir John Temple, was born in London, in 1628. He was instructed by the learned Dr. Hammond, his maternal uncle, and completed his studies at Emmanuel college, Cambridge. In his twenty-fifth year he commenced his travels, and passed six years in France, Holland, Flanders, and Germany. In 1665 he went on a secret mission to Munster, after which he was employed in forming the triple alliance between England, Sweden, and Holland. He next became the resident minister at the Hague, and in that capacity promoted the marriage of the prince of Orange with Mary, eldest daughter of the duke of York, which union took place in 1677. A change of politics at home led to the recall of Temple, in 1689, who, refusing to assist in the intended breach with Holland, retired from public business to Sheen, and employed himself in writing his "Observations on the United Provinces," and part of his Miscellanies. In 1674, Sir William Temple was again ambassador to the states-general, in order to negotiate a general pacification. In 1679 he was appointed secretary of state; but the next year he resigned that situation, and retired to his country seat in Surrey, where he was often visited by Charles II., James II., and William III. Died, 1700.

TEMPLEMAN, PETER, a physician, born at Dorchester, in 1711; was educated at the Charter-house, and at Trinity college, Cambridge; and took his degree at Leyden. He practised in London; but a fondness for literature and the company of literary men diverted his attention from his profession; and having, in 1753, obtained a situation in the British museum, as keeper of the reading-room, he from that time devoted his whole attention to pursuits more congenial to his disposition. He wrote some medical works, and translated "Norden's Travels in Egypt." Died, 1769.

TENIERS, DAVID, the elder, a celebrated painter of the Flemish school, was born at Antwerp, in 1582; studied under Rubens, and afterwards at Rome. On his return to his native country, he occupied himself principally in the delineation of fairs, rustic sports, and carousals, &c., which he exhibited with such truth, humour, and originality, that he may be considered the founder of a style of painting, which his son afterwards brought to perfection. His pictures are usually of a small size, and are considered very valuable. Died, 1649.

TENIERS, DAVID, the younger, a son of the preceding, was born at Brussels, in 1610. In his youth such was his facility of imitating the styles of various masters, that he was called the Proteus and the Ape of Painting. He confined himself principally to the same kind of subjects as his father, but excelled him in correctness and finish. Died, 1694. The younger Teniers rose to the highest reputation in his profession, and was patronized by Christina of Sweden, the king of Spain, and other illustrious personages.

TENISON, THOMAS, archbishop of Canterbury, a learned and pious prelate, was born at Cottenham, in Cambridgeshire, in 1636, and graduated at Corpus Christi college; obtained the living of St. Peter Mancroft, Norwich; and was afterwards presented to the vicarage of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, where he founded a parochial school and library. He distinguished himself so much by his zeal in favour of Protestantism, both before and after the Revolution, that in 1691 he was consecrated bishop of Lincoln, from whence he was raised to the see of Canterbury in 1694, and held the primacy with moderation, firmness, and ability, till his death, in 1715. He published "The Creed of Hobbes examined;" "Baconiana, or Remains of Sir F. Bacon;" "Sir Thomas Browne's Tracts;" and various Sermons.

TENNANT, SMITHSON, F.R.S., an eminent chemist, was born at Selby, in Yorkshire, in 1761; studied medicine at Edinburgh, and took his degree at Cambridge, in 1790. He was chosen professor of chemistry at Cambridge, in 1813; and was killed by a fall from his horse, at Boulogne, in February, 1815. His discoveries appear in the Transactions of the Philosophical Society, and are highly useful.

TERENCE, or PUBLIUS TERENTIUS, a celebrated Latin writer of comedies, was born at Carthage, about A.D. 194. He was brought a slave to Rome in his youth, but falling into the hands of a generous master named Terentius Lucanus, he gave him a good education, and afterwards his liberty. His poetical talents procured him the friendship of Scipio and Lælius; and for one of his plays, "The Eunuch," he received 8000 sesterces. Terence was a great admirer of Menander, and went to Greece to collect his works; but died on his passage home, either at sea, or at Stymphalis, in Arcadia.

TERPANDER, a Lesbian poet, who flourished in the seventh century, B.C. He is said to have been the inventor of an additional string to the lyre.

TERRASSON. Of this name there were several ingenious French writers in the 17th and 18th centuries; the most eminent of whom were JEAN and ANTOINE.—The former was born at Lyons, in 1670; and had the reputation of being one of the best practical philosophers of the age. Died, 1750.—ANTOINE was born at Paris, in 1708. He composed, by order of the chancellor D'Aguesseau, the "History of Roman Jurisprudence; for which he was named censor royal and professor in the royal college. Died, 1782.

TERRY, EDWARD, an English traveller, born about 1590. He accompanied Sir Thomas Roe, ambassador to the Great Mogul, in 1615; and on his return published an account of the observations he had made during his two years' residence abroad.

TERRY, DANIEL, a comedian of considerable ability, was born at Bath, about 1780, and was articled to Mr. Wyatt, the architect, with whom he remained five years, and then turned his attention to the drama. His first attempts were not very encouraging; but when, in 1806, he appeared on the Liverpool stage, he found favour with the public; as he did also afterwards at Edinburgh, where he became a leading actor. Through the interest of Sir Walter Scott, he obtained an engagement at the Haymarket theatre, in 1812; and after remaining there two seasons, he appeared, first at Covent-garden, but soon after at Drury-lane, where he continued till 1823, generally playing in the summer at the Haymarket. He then entered into partnership with Mr. Yates in the proprietorship of the Adelphi theatre; but being indebted to Sir Walter Scott for the capital embarked in it, and the baronet's affairs being at that time in an embarrassed state through the failure of Constable and Co. of Edinburgh, he found it necessary to sell his share. He then went over to the continent, but mental anxiety destroyed his health, and he died in June, 1828.

TERTULLIAN, QUINTUS SEPTIMIUS FLORENTINUS, a celebrated father and defender of the primitive Christian church, who flourished under the reigns of the emperors Severus and Caracalla. He died about 248. Among his works are, "An Apology for the Christians;" a "Treatise against the Jews;" and the five books of Marcion.

TESSIN, NICODRIMUS, a senator of Sweden, principally celebrated for his architectural works, was born at Nikoping, in 1654. He held several high appointments in the government; and numerous public edifices were erected from his designs. Died, 1718.

TESSIN, CHARLES GUSTAVUS, count de, son of the preceding, was born at Stockholm, in 1695; and on entering the arena of public life, became a man of extensive influence; assisted at the most secret deliberations of the states, and was nominated president of the assembly of nobility in the diet of 1738. He was subsequently ambassador to various foreign courts, had the direction of foreign affairs as president of the chancery; and at the same time he was appointed governor of the prince royal, afterwards Gustavus III., to whom he addressed a series of letters relative to morals, politics, &c. In 1780 he resigned all his employments; and died in 1770.

TESTI, FULVIO, an eminent lyric poet, and accounted the Horace of modern Italy. He was born at Ferrara, in 1593, of a noble family; was thrown into prison in consequence of having entered into a correspondence with cardinal Mazarin; and is supposed to have been there put to death, in 1646.

TETZEL, JOHN, a Dominican monk of the 16th century, was born at Piern upon the Elbe. Being appointed, in 1517, to vend the indulgences issued by pope Leo X. for the completion of St. Peter's church at Rome, he represented them as possessing the virtue of pardoning all sins, past, present, and future. This first roused the indignation of Luther, and may truly be said to have been the primary cause of the Reformation. The papal government, seeing the mischief likely to accrue from the indiscreet zeal and bigotry of Tetzels, so severely rebuked him, that he is said to have died of a broken heart, in 1519.

THALES, the chief of the seven sages of Greece, born at Miletus, B.C. 640, founded the Ionic sect of philosophers; and died, B.C. 548. He was an excellent geometrician and astronomer; fixed the revolution of the sun at 365 days, and was the first Greek who predicted a solar eclipse. He also united moral and political wisdom to the researches of science; and exemplified his knowledge of mankind by numerous pithy aphorisms.

THELLUSON, PETER ISAAC, a native of Geneva, who settled as a merchant in London, where he acquired a prodigious fortune, and died in 1798. He left about 100,000*l.* to his family; and the remainder of his property, considerably above half a million, is to accumulate during the lives of his three sons and the lives of their sons; when, if there are none of his descendants and name existing, the whole is to be added to the sinking fund. This singular will being contested by the heirs at law, was established by a decision of the House of Lords in 1803; it, however, occasioned the passing of an act, restraining the power of devising property for the purpose of accumulation to twenty-one years after the death of the testator.

THELLUSON, PETER ISAAC, eldest son of the preceding, was raised to the peerage by the title of baron Rendlesham, in 1808, and died in 1808, leaving several sons.

died A.D. 386. More than thirty orations of Themistocles are still extant.

THEMISTOCLES, an illustrious Athenian, equally celebrated as a warrior and a statesman, was born about 530 B.C. He was licentious in his youth, but was reclaimed from his follies by the love of glory. He persuaded his countrymen to make war upon Ægina; and by his management raised Athens to a great naval power. He gained the famous battle of Marathon, and ten years afterwards defeated the fleet of Xerxes off Salamis. He rebuilt the walls of Athens, fortified the Piræus, and prevented the Spartans from gaining an ascendancy in the Amphictyonic council. Notwithstanding his great services, however, the popular favour was withdrawn from him, and he was banished for five years. He sought an asylum at the court of Artaxerxes, where he was hospitably received; and died, B.C. 470.

THEOBALD, Louis, a dramatic critic and poet, known as a commentator on Shakspeare, and as the original hero in Pope's "Dunciad," where its splenetic author placed him, more for having published an edition of Shakspeare immediately after the appearance of his own, than for the sin of dulness, which he makes the ostensible cause. He was a native of Sittingbourne, Kent; and died in 1744.

THEOCRITUS, a Greek pastoral poet, who flourished at Syracuse, B.C. 382. Of his various works we have only the "Idylls," and "Epigrams;" the former of which are remarkable for their pleasing simplicity and sweetness.

THEODORET, an ecclesiastical historian, and a father of the church, was born at Antioch about the year 386. In 420 he was made bishop of Cyrus, in Syria, where he laboured assiduously in converting a rude people, and opposing the errors of Nestorius. Died, 457.

THEODORIC, surnamed the Great, king of the Ostrogoths, was born near Vienna, in 458. He made great accessions to his dominions, and governed with extraordinary vigour and ability. Died, 526.

THEODOSIUS, surnamed the Great, the last Roman emperor, was a convert to Christianity, and a renowned general and legislator: born, 336; died, 395. His sons, Arcadius and Honorius, made a division of the empire into East and West; Arcadius being the first emperor of the East, and Honorius of the West.

THEODOSIUS II., son of Arcadius, whom he succeeded in the empire of the East. He was famous for a code of laws, styled after him "The Theodosian Code." Died, 450.

THEODOSIUS, a mathematician, of Tripoli, who lived in the first century; and is supposed by Suidas to be the same with Theodosius of Bythynia, of whom Strabo speaks as being a skillful astronomer and mathematician.

THEOGNIS, a Greek poet, was a native of Megara, and born about 550 B.C. He wrote a series of moral precepts in verse.

THEON of Alexandria, a philosopher and mathematician in the time of Theodosius the Great, was father of the celebrated Hypatia.

THEOPHANES, GEORGE, a Greek historian, was born at Constantinople, of a noble family. Leo, the Armenian, exiled him to Samothrace, where he died in 818.

THEOPHANES, PAVLOVITCH, a Russian historian, was born in 1681. He was archbishop of Novogorod, and died in 1766. He wrote the "Life of Peter the Great," and some theological treatises.

THEOPHILE DE VIAUD, a French poet, born in 1590, at Clerac, in the Agenois. His satires and epigrams are spirited and witty, but several of his pieces are offensive to decency and religion; and on that score he suffered two years' imprisonment. Died, 1626.

THEOPHILUS, a celebrated bishop of Antioch, who flourished in the second century. He was the first who used the term Trinity to express the three persons in the Godhead, the third of whom he denominates "Wisdom."

THEOPHRASTUS, a celebrated Greek philosopher, was born at Eresius, in Lesbos, B.C. 371. He was a disciple of Plato, and afterwards of Aristotle, the latter of whom he succeeded as master of the peripatetic school, where he had two thousand scholars. He is said to have delivered his country twice from the oppression of tyrants; and died at the age of 85, lamenting the brevity of human life. Several of his works are extant; the principal of which are, the "History of Plants;" the "Treatise on Stones;" and the "Moral Characters of Men."

THERAMENES, an illustrious Athenian, was one of the thirty tyrants, but so zealously opposed his colleagues in their barbarities, as to excite their hatred. Accordingly, Critias denounced him to the senate, and when he perceived a disposition on the part of the judges to acquit the accused, he surrounded the tribunal with his creatures, and denounced sentence of death against Theramenes by his own authority. Socrates endeavoured to save the life of his friend, but in vain; and Theramenes, finding himself overpowered by his enemies, drank off the fatal draught prepared for him, to the health of Critias. This occurred B.C. 406.

THESPIA, a Greek poet, born at Icaria, in Attica. He is considered the inventor of tragedy, from his having introduced actors in addition to the chorus, and was the author of several tragedies.

THEVENOT, MELCHISEDÈC, an eminent traveller, was born at Paris, in 1621. He travelled in various parts of Europe; and on his return devoted himself entirely to study, and to the promotion of the interests of literature, by collecting books and manuscripts, and by carrying on a correspondence with the learned, in all parts of the world. He was appointed royal librarian; published his "Voyages and Travels;" and died in 1692.

THEVENOT, JOHN DE, nephew of the preceding, was born at Paris, in 1633. Being enabled to gratify his love of travelling, he visited several parts of Europe, and afterwards explored many countries in the East. On his second Oriental tour, as he was returning from Hindostan, through Persia, he died near Tauris, in 1667.

THICKNESSE, PHILIP, the son of a clergyman, and brother to the master of St. Paul's school, was born in 1720. He entered the army when young, and went to Georgia with governor Oglethorpe; after which he served in the West Indies, and on his return to England, obtained a captain's commission. He first married a French lady; and on becoming a widower, he obtained the hand of lady Elizabeth Touchet, heiress of the ancient barony of Audley; and her fortune enabled him to purchase the office of lieutenant-governor to Landguard Fort. By this lady he had one son, with whom, on his succeeding to the title and estate of his mother's family, he had some very unpleasant disputes. About 1761, Mr. Thicknesse lost his second consort, and shortly after married Miss Anne Ford, by whom he had a numerous family. After travelling through France, Italy, and Spain, he settled in Wales, and next at Bath; but at the commencement of the French revolution he went abroad again; and died near Boulogne, in 1792. He published several works, the most curious of which is an account of his own life, with the following title, "Memoirs and Anecdotes of Philip Thicknesse, late Lieutenant-Governor of Landguard Fort, and unfortunately Father to George Touchet, Baron Audley," 2 vols.

THICKNESSE, ANNE, a lady of great beauty and acquirements, the daughter of John Ford, an eminent solicitor and clerk of the arraigns, was born in 1737. She eloped from her father's house, in order to avoid a disagreeable marriage; and her talents and personal attractions having early introduced her into the world of fashion, she took advantage of that circumstance, to give three concerts at the opera-house, by which she realized 1500*l*. and acquiring the patronage of lady Thicknesse, she became domesticated in the family. On the death of this lady, the widower, after a due interval, offered her his hand, which she accepted; and during a union of thirty years, till his death in 1792, she accompanied him on various journeys to different parts of the continent. The French revolution had now commenced; and Mrs. Thicknesse, in company with several other English ladies, was imprisoned, but fortunately escaped the guillotine, through the death of Robespierre, who had sent an order for their execution. She ended her long and exemplary life, at her house in the Edgeware-road, London, in 1824. She was personally intimate with the leading wits of her own time, and spoke several languages with fluency and elegance. Her principal works are, "Biographical Sketches of Literary Females of the French Nation," 3 vols., and a novel, entitled "The School of Fashion," 2 vols.

THIERRI, or THEODORIC DE NIEM, a German, who was secretary to several popes, and attended John XXIII. to the council of Constance; but when that pontiff died, he wrote against him. He died about 1417.

THIERS, JOHN BAPTIST, a French ec-clesiastic, was born at Chartres, in 1636, and died at Mans, in 1703. He wrote several books, particularly "A History of Perukes;" being an invective against those ecclesiastics who adopted that ornament. His best performance is "Traité des Superstitions qui regardent les Sacramens," 4 vols.

THIRLBY, SYDNEY, a learned critic, born at Leicester, in 1692. He was a man of intemperate habits; and though he studied divinity, physic, and civil law, he never applied himself to either as a profession. Through the interest of Sir Edward Walpole, he obtained a small sinecure place in the custom-house; and died in 1753. His edition of Justin Martyr, with notes and emendations, is esteemed a valuable performance.

THISTLEWOOD, ARTHUR, memorable as the leader of the "Cato-street" conspirators in 1800, was the son of a respectable farmer near Lincoln, and was born in 1772. He obtained a lieutenant's commission in the supplementary militia, in 1797, and shortly after married a young lady with a considerable fortune, but who died about eighteen months after their union. After squandering his property in habits of dissipation and gambling, he left Lincoln for London, and from thence made occasional voyages to America and France, where he probably contracted that spirit of discontent which influenced his future conduct. He married again, and thereby improved his circumstances; but he had now become a gambler by profession, and had also connected himself with disaffected characters, which drew on him the notice of government. When the riots in Spa-fields took place, he was arrested as one of the ring-leaders; but after being kept some time in confinement, he was liberated, there being no proof of his guilt. Shortly after, he sent a challenge to the Home-secretary, lord Sidmouth, as the author of the bad treatment he had received during his confinement; which occasioned his subsequent detention in prison for a considerable time. Burning with rage, he madly became the principal agent in the Cato-street conspiracy, the object of which was to murder several members of the administration, while at a cabinet-dinner at lord Harrowby's, and excite an insurrection in the metropolis. Information, however, having been given to the ministers by a spy employed for the purpose, a party of police-officers, with a company of the guards ready at hand if wanted, proceeded to the place of meeting,—a room over some stables in Cato-street,—where the wretched conspirators were, at the time, preparing for their diabolical enterprise. As soon as the officers had effected an entrance, Thistlewood seized a sword, and killed the foremost of them, named Smithers, on the spot. But he and his confederates, (who were all ignorant persons, of the lowest grade in society), were quickly secured; and being brought to trial, were condemned, and suffered as traitors, May 1, 1800.

VI., who gave him, though a layman, some ecclesiastical preferments; of which he was deprived in the next reign; and being accused of treasonable practices, was executed at Tyburn, in 1553. He was the author of "The History of Italy," and some other works of minor importance.

THOMAS, WILLIAM, an eminent prelate, was born at Bristol, in 1613. He suffered much during the rebellion, but afterwards became precentor of St. David's: he was also chaplain to the duke of York, and preceptor to his daughter, afterwards queen Anne. In 1663 he was made dean of Worcester, whence he was removed to the see of St. David's; and died, bishop of Worcester, in 1689.

THOMAS, WILLIAM, a grandson of the preceding, was born in 1670; and educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge. He obtained the living of Exal, in Warwickshire; and in 1733 was presented to the rectory of St. Nicholas, in Worcester. Died, 1738. He published "Antiquitates Prioratus majoris Malverne;" "An enlarged edition of Dugdale's Warwickshire," 2 vols.; and a "Survey of Worcester Cathedral." He had made collections for a History of Worcestershire, which fell into the hands of Dr. Tricardway Naah, and served as the foundation of his work.

THOMAS, ANTHONY LEONARD, an eminent French writer, was born in 1732, at Clermont, in Auvergne. He was a professor in the college of Beauvais, at Paris; and afterwards secretary to the duke of Orleans. Died, 1785. Among his works are, "Reflexions Historiques et Littéraires sur le Poème de la Religion Naturelle de Voltaire," and "Essai sur le Caractère, les Mœurs, et l'Esprit des Femmes."

THOMAS, ELIZABETH, a female writer, to whom Dryden gave the appellation of Corinna, but whom Pope placed in the Dunciad, was born in 1675, and died in 1730. Her poems and letters were printed after her death, with a memoir written by herself, and well seasoned with romantic incidents.

THOMAS, JOHN, a learned and liberal prelate, was born at Carlisle, in 1712. He studied at Queen's college, Oxford; and on leaving the university, he lived in the family of Sir William Clayton, as tutor to his son. Having been ordained, he became rector of Bletchingley, in Surrey, and married the daughter of his patron. He was, successively, chaplain to the king, prebendary of Westminster, and vicar of St. Bride's, Fleet-street. In 1768 he succeeded bishop Pearce in the deanery of Westminster, and in 1774 was consecrated bishop of Rochester. Died, 1793.

THOMAS, ROBERT, M.D. a physician, resident at Salisbury; author of "The Modern Practice of Physic," and other esteemed medical works. Died, Sept. 1836, aged 83.

THOMASSIN, LOUIS, a French ecclesiastic, was born in 1619, at Aix, in Provence. He became a member of the congregation of the Oratory, and professor of divinity at Saumur, whence he was called to Paris, where he taught in the seminary of St. Magloire, with great reputation. He wrote many works; but the most important are, "De la Discipline Ecclésiastique," and "Dogmata Theologica." The former of these was so much esteemed at Rome, that pope Innocent XI. invited him to the papal court, with the promise of a cardinal's hat, but Louis XIV. refused his sanction. Died, 1695.

THOMPSON, WILLIAM, a poet and divine, was born at Brough, in Westmoreland; graduated, A.M., at Queen's college, Oxford, in 1738; became dean of Raphoe, in Ireland; and died in 1786. He published two volumes of poems, among which those entitled "Sickness," and the "Hymn to May," have received the meed of public approbation.

THOMSON, JAMES, a distinguished and highly popular poet, the son of a Scotch clergyman, was born at Ednam, in Roxburghshire, in 1700; and was educated at Jedburgh and at Edinburgh. Relinquishing his views in the church, he went to London, where, in 1736, he published his "Winter." In 1737 appeared his "Summer," which he addressed to Bubb Doddington. This was followed the year after by "Spring;" and in 1739 by "Autumn." In the course of these publications Thomson produced "Sophronisba," a tragedy; and a "Poem on Sir Isaac Newton." Not long after this he was selected as the travelling associate of Mr. Talbot; and was thus occupied for three years, in the course of which he visited most of the European courts. On his return, he was rewarded with the post of secretary of briefs by the lord chancellor Talbot, which was nearly a sinecure. About this time he published his poem of "Liberty," with the cool reception of which he was much disappointed. Soon after, by the death of lord chancellor Talbot, Thomson's office was vacated, and lord Hardwick, who succeeded to the seals, gave it to another; but he was indemnified by the office of surveyor-general of the Leeward Islands, and a pension from the Prince of Wales. In 1738 he produced a second tragedy, entitled "Agamemnon," which was followed by "Edward and Eleanora," "Tancred and Sigismunda," and "Coriolanus;" the masque of "Alfred," in conjunction with Mallet; and the poems of "Liberty," and "The Castle of Indulgence." He died at Richmond, in 1748.

THOMSON, ALEXANDER, a poet and miscellaneous writer; author of "The British Parnassus at the Close of the Eighteenth Century, a poem in four Cantos;" "The Paradise of Taste," a poem; "Pictures of Poetry, Historical, Biographical, and Critical," &c. Died, at Edinburgh, 1803, aged 41.

THOMSON, WILLIAM, an industrious writer and compiler, was born in 1746, at Burnside, in Perthshire; was educated for the church; became librarian to the earl of Kinnoul and minister of Monivard; and ultimately settled in London as an author by profession. His compilations were extremely numerous; and he prepared for the press many works of other authors: he was also the editor of several periodical publications, as the "English Review;" the "Political Magazine;" the "Whitehall Evening Post;" and the "Annual Register." Among his original works are, "The Man in the Moon," a novel; "Memoirs of the War in Asia," 3 vols. Died, 1817.

THOMSON, DR. ANDREW, an eminent modern divine, and leader in the national church courts of Scotland, was born at Sanquhar, in Dumfriesshire, in 1779. He was ordained minister of the parish of Spronsdon in 1803; removed to the East Church of Perth in 1808, where he laboured assiduously and successfully till 1810, when he received a presentation from the magistrates and council of Edinburgh, to the New Grey Friar's church in that city. Eloquent, indefatigable, and zealous, he came prepared to the discussion of every subject, making an impression on the public mind which has but few parallels in the history of ministerial labours. In 1814 he was appointed to St. George's church, where, labouring in his vocation with surpassing energy, he rapidly extended his reputation, and acquired extraordinary influence. He died in 1831.

THORESBY, RALPH, an eminent antiquary and topographer, was born at Leeds, in 1658. He was educated at the school of his native place, after which he went to Rotterdam to learn the Dutch and French languages, to qualify him for mercantile pursuits. On the death of his father he succeeded to a large concern, but he found leisure to cultivate his taste for antiquarian pursuits, and produced the "Topography of Leeds;" "Vicaria Leodiensis," &c. Died, 1735.

THORNHILL, SIR JAMES, an eminent English painter, was born in 1676, at Weymouth, in Dorsetshire; and after studying in this country, greatly improved himself on the continent. On his return, he was much engaged in the decoration of palaces and public buildings. Among his principal works are, the dome of St. Paul's, the refectory and saloon at Greenwich hospital, the hall at Blenheim, and some of the apartments at Hampton Court. He displayed great judgment in treating allegorical compositions; and he was by no means an indifferent architect. Died, 1734.

THORNTON, BONNET, a humorous writer and poet, was born in London, in 1734; and was educated at Westminster school, and Christchurch, Oxford. He made literature his profession, and was on terms of intimacy with many of the wits of the age; united with the elder Colman in the "Connoisseur;" and was a fertile contributor to the periodicals of the day. He also projected an exhibition of sign paintings; and brought out a burlesque "Ode for St. Cecilia's Day," which afforded much amusement. In 1768 he published a translation of Plautus; and the year following a poem, entitled "The Battle of the Wigs," in ridicule of the dispute between the licentiate and fellows of the College of Physicians. Died, 1768.

THORNTON, THOMAS, lieutenant-colonel of the West York militia, a noted sportsman and writer on field sports. He was the author of "A Sporting Tour through France," 2 vols. 4to., and "A Sporting Tour through the North of England and the Highlands of Scotland." Died, 1833.

THORNTON, JOHN BONNET, a celebrated botanist, the younger son of the preceding, was born about 1758, and was educated at Cambridge. Shortly after this, having acquired an important accession of fortune by the death of his brother, he resolved to make medicine his profession, and became a member of Guy's Hospital. After studying three years in London, he visited the continent; and, returning to the metropolis, commenced practice with considerable success. In 1798 he published a work in support of the Brunonian system, entitled, "The Philosophy of Medicine, or Medical Extracts on the nature of Health and Disease," in 8 vols. Soon after, he brought out a work, called "The Philosophy of Politics," &c., 3 vols.; but he derives his chief fame from his magnificent "Temple of Flora, or Garden of the Botanist, Poet, Painter, and Philosopher." Died, 1837.

THORPE, JOHN, a physician and antiquary, was born at Penshurst, in Kent, in 1682, and settled at Rochester, of which city he published some curious ancient illustrations. Died, 1750.—His son, JOHN THORPE, born in 1713, devoted great part of his life to the study of antiquities, and was the author of "Registrum Roffense," and other works relating to Rochester. Died, 1792.

THOU, JAMES AUGUSTUS DE, or THUANUS, a celebrated historian, was the son of Christopher de Thou, first president of the parliament of Paris; was born in that city, in 1553; and died in 1617. The "History of his own Times," from 1545 to 1607, is written in pure Latin, and with great dexterity.

THOU, FRANCIS AUGUSTUS DE, son of the preceding, inherited the virtues and intelligence of his father; but having been privy to the secret correspondence carried on between Cinquars and the court of Spain, he was beheaded, at Lyons, in 1642.

THROSBY, JOHN, a writer of local topography, was born in 1748, and was for many years parish-clerk of St. Martin's, Leicester. He wrote several works relative to the "History and Topography of Leicester," and its vicinity. Died, 1803.

THRASYBULUS, a renowned Athenian general and patriot, the deliverer of his country from the yoke of the thirty tyrants, flourished 294 B.C.

THUCYDIDES, a Greek historian, was born at Athens 469 years before the Christian era. He was of noble birth, and on arriving at maturity entered into the army; but falling in an expedition with which he had been entrusted, he was banished; and in his exile he wrote the "History of his Times;" a work which far exceeds that of Herodotus in sweetness of style, grace, and elegance of expression. He was afterwards recalled, and died at Athens B.C. 391.

to Japan. While there he was allowed to explore the curiosities of that interesting country; thence he proceeded to Ceylon; and on his return to Sweden, he succeeded Linnaeus, whose pupil he had originally been, in the professorship of botany at Upsal. He was also a member of many philosophical societies in Europe and America; and died in 1828.

THURLOE, JOHN, a statesman and political writer, was a native of Essex, and born in 1616. He was secretary of state during the protectorate; and though immediately after the Restoration he was arrested on a charge of high treason, yet such was Charles the Second's opinion of his talent and integrity, that he afterwards often invited him to take part in his administration, which he thought proper to decline. Died, 1668. His state papers have been published, and form a very valuable collection.

THURLOW, EDWARD, lord high chancellor of Great Britain, was born in 1738, and was called to the bar in 1758. He filled the offices of solicitor-general and attorney-general; was chosen M.P. for Tamworth, and became a warm and powerful supporter of the ministry in the house of commons. He retired from office in 1783, but resumed it again on the dissolution of the coalition ministry, and continued to hold the seals under the premiership of Mr. Pitt till 1792. Died, 1806.

THUROT, FRANCIS, a French naval officer, born in 1727. Having rendered himself conspicuous by his courage and success while in command of a privateer, he was invited to enter into the royal navy, and entrusted with the command of five frigates and a corvette, destined to make a descent on the British coasts. He sailed on this expedition Oct. 15, 1759, and arriving at Carrickfergus-bay, in Ireland, Jan. 10 following, the troops were landed, and the place surrendered in a few days. Thurot thought proper, however, to re-embark his troops; and on his return to France, his vessels were attacked by an English squadron, and he fell in the engagement, Jan. 30, 1760.

THYNNE, FRANCIS, a herald and antiquary of the 16th century, was the son of William Thynne, the editor of Chaucer, and steward of the household to Henry VIII. He was educated at Tunbridge-school, and Magdalen college, Oxford; became a member of Lincoln's-inn; and in 1602 was made Lancaster herald. Hearne published "A Discourse of the Duty and Office of an Herald of Arms," written by Thynne, who also continued Hollinshed's Chronicle; and wrote a "History of Dover Castle and the Cinque Ports," which, with many other productions, remain in MS. Died, 1611.

TIARKS, JOHN LEWIS, F.R.S., an astronomer, was born at Jever, in 1760; studied at Göttingen; and, coming to London in 1810, became assistant librarian to Sir Joseph Banks. In 1816 he visited Germany; and on his return, received the appointment of British astronomer to the American boundary line commission: he accordingly proceeded to America, where he remained till 1821; but the state of the question not requiring his immediate return, the Board of Longitude took advantage of the opportunity presented by the delay to recommend to the Admiralty the determination of the longitude of various places by means of observations on chronometers. For this purpose the Comet steam-boat was fitted out; and Dr. Tiarks first proceeded to Madeira. He afterwards carried on his operations with twenty-five chronometers, on the southern and western coasts of England; and subsequently, in conjunction with the German astronomers, at various stations in the North Seas. In 1825 he was recalled from Germany, to proceed to the interior of America, for the purpose of ascertaining the most north-western point of the Lake of the Woods; and in carrying on the operations in this remote region, he endured the greatest hardships, seeing neither house nor human being for many weeks together, and sleeping on the snow, with fires round the tents to protect them from the wolves. The object of his journey being accomplished, he returned; and proceeded to the Hague, in 1828, for the purpose of giving information on the American boundary line question, referred to the arbitration of the king of the Netherlands. He died in 1837.

TIBERIUS, CLAUDIUS NERO, emperor of Rome, was born B.C. 42, and succeeded Augustus. He displayed his real character in his cruelty to his mother Livy and his wife Julia, and in the murder of many of the senators. He also caused Germanicus to be poisoned, and committed numerous excesses. In the midst, however, of all his tyranny, he often exhibited gleams of strong sense, and of a judicious attention to the public welfare. But his crimes infinitely exceeded his virtues; and he died at Misenum, A.D. 37, universally execrated.

TIBERIUS, CONSTANTINE, raised by his merit to the throne of the eastern empire, became the father of his people, and is equally extolled for his valour, his love of justice, and his clemency. He died, 582.

TIBULLUS, AULUS ALBIUS, a celebrated Latin elegiac poet and critic, born 43 B.C.; died, A.D. 17. This author has usually been printed in the same volume with Catullus and Propertius.

TICKELL, THOMAS, a poet and essayist, was born in 1686, at Bridekirk, in Cumberland; and became fellow of Queen's college, Oxford. Through the friendship of Addison, he was made under-secretary of state; and was afterwards appointed secretary to the lords justices of Ireland. Some of his pieces are in the Spectator; besides which, he wrote "The Prospect of Peace;" "The Royal Progress;" and other poems; and translated the first book of the Iliad. Died, 1740.

TICKELL, RICHARD, a poet and political writer, who died in 1793. His principal piece was a pamphlet called "Anticipation."

TIEDEMANN, DIETRICH, an eminent writer, was born in 1748, at Bremervorde, in the duchy of Bremen; and died in 1803.

His principal works are, "An Essay on the Origin of Languages;" "System of the Stolic Philosophy;" an "Investigation of Man;" "The first Philosophers of Greece;" and "The Spirit of Speculative Philosophy."

TIERNEY, GEORGE, a distinguished statesman and political writer, was born in London, in 1756; received his education at Cambridge; and was designed for the bar. At the commencement of his public life, Mr. Tierney attached himself to the Whigs, and in 1796 he was elected M.P. for Southwark. He soon proved himself an able debater, and was one of the most formidable opponents of Mr. Pitt. In 1806 he lost his seat as member for Southwark, and afterwards successively represented Atholone, Bandonbridge, Appleby, and Knaresborough. During a debate in the year 1798, some words spoken in the House were the cause of a duel between him and Mr. Pitt, in which, however, neither party was wounded. When Mr. Addington became minister, in 1802, he made Mr. Tierney treasurer of the navy. In 1806, under the Grenville administration, he became president of the board of control, but went out of office early in the following year, on the resignation of the ministry. On the formation of the Canning ministry, he was appointed to the mastership of the mint; from which he retired, with lord Goderich, in 1828; and died in 1830.

TILLEMANS, PETER, a celebrated painter, was a native of Antwerp: he came to England in 1704, and was employed by several noblemen in taking views of their seats, huntings, races, and horses. Died, 1734.

TILLEMONT, SEBASTIAN LE NAIN DE, a French historian and critic, was born at Paris, in 1637. His "History of the Emperors," and "Ecclesiastical History," are written with great fidelity and clearness. Died, 1698.

TILLI, MICHAEL ANGELO, botanist and physician, was born at Florence, in 1655. His greatest work is the "Catalogus Horti Pisani," printed at Florence, 1733. Died, 1740.

TILLOCH, ALEXANDER, was born at Glasgow, in 1759. His father was a tobaccoist, and it was his intention to bring up his son to the same trade; but his mind was bent on mechanical improvements, and, at length, though totally uneducated, he formed the idea of printing with stereotyped plates. He began his experiments in 1781; and having succeeded in them, Mr. Foulis, a printer of Glasgow, joined him, and a patent was taken out in their names. Circumstances, however, induced them to lay it aside for a time, and it was never afterwards renewed by them as a speculation. In 1797 Mr. Tilloch quitted Scotland for London, and soon after purchased "The Star," an evening paper, of which he became the editor, and carried it on till within four years of his death. In 1797 he projected and established the "Philosophical Magazine," which he carried on for a number of years with great credit; and only fifteen days before his death he had obtained a patent for an improvement on the steam-engine. Yet amidst these avocations he found time for theological studies, and published some papers on the Prophecies. In 1823 he printed an octavo volume, entitled "Dissertations on the Apocalypse;" and he was latterly engaged in superintending "The Mechanic's Oracle." Some years before his death the university of Glasgow conferred on him the degree of LL.D.; and he preached occasionally to a dissenting congregation in Goswell-street road. Died, 1835.

TILLOTSON, a distinguished English prelate, was the son of a clothier at Sowerby, near Halifax, and born in 1630. His father, who was a strict Calvinist, brought him up in the same principles, and sent him to Clare-hall, Cambridge. At the Restoration he conformed to the established church; was made king's chaplain, and presented to a prebend of Canterbury. When Charles II., in 1672, issued a declaration for liberty of conscience, for the purpose of favouring the Roman Catholics, he preached strongly against it, but was, nevertheless, advanced to the deanery of Canterbury, and obtained a prebend in St. Paul's. He warmly promoted the exclusion bill against the duke of York, and refused to sign the address of the London clergy to the king, on his declaration that he would not consent to it. At the execution of lord William Russell, he attended him with Dr. Burnet; and, though afterwards decided friends to the Revolution, both these divines urged that nobleman to acknowledge the unwisdom of resistance. After the Revolution, he was appointed clerk of the closet; and, on the deprivation of Sancroft, in 1691, he was raised to the see of Canterbury. Died, 1694. His sermons rank among the most popular in the English language, and were at one time regarded as a standard of finished oratory.

TILLY, JOHN TIERKLAS, count of, one of the most celebrated generals of the 17th century, was a native of Brabant, and born in 1598. He rose by degrees to the command of the army of the league, and in the seven years' war was appointed generalissimo of the imperial troops. His character for military talents and bravery was of the highest kind, but he stained his laurels by uncalled-for cruelty. After gaining thirty-six battles, he was entirely defeated by Gustavus Adolphus, at Breitenfeld, Sept. 7, 1631; and being wounded by a cannon-ball in a subsequent engagement, he died in 1632.

TILLY, ALEXANDER DE, count, was descended from an ancient family in Normandy, and born in 1754. He entered young into the army, and was a zealous royalist from the commencement of the French revolution. In 1792 he exerted his best abilities in defence of Louis XVI.; subsequently emigrated; returned with the Bourbons in 1814; was compelled to leave France again on Buonaparte's escape from Elba; and put an end to his own existence at Brussels, in 1816. He was the author of some spirited political essays; "Œuvres mêlées;" "De la Revolution Française en 1794," &c.

TILLY, Lieutenant-general the count de, was also a native of Normandy, but of a different family from the preceding. Becoming a partisan of the Revolution, he was made a colonel of cavalry in 1793; was sent, in 1793, to oppose the Vendéens, over whom he gained some advantages; subsequently commanded the army of the Sambre and Meuse; and was governor of Brussels, in 1796. He served in Austria, Prussia, Poland, and Spain, under the imperial government; and having accepted an appointment during the hundred days, was not employed after the second restoration of the Bourbons. Died, 1822.

TIMÆUS, a Pythagorean philosopher, was a native of Locris, in Greece, and is styled by Plato "a most diligent enquirer into all the works of nature."—TIMÆUS, a Greek historian, banished from Sicily by Agathocles, tyrant of Syracuse. He wrote a "History of the Wars of Pyrrhus;" a "General History of Sicily," &c.—TIMÆUS, the Sophist; author of a "Dictionary of Platonic Phrases," who is supposed to have flourished about A.D. 400.

TIMOLEON, an illustrious Greek, was born at Corinth, about four centuries before the Christian era. He early exhibited marks of intrepid courage and a hatred of tyranny; which he carried to such a pitch, that, according to Plutarch, he stood by while his brother Timophanes, who would not resign his usurped authority, was assassinated. When the Syracusans solicited the aid of the Corinthians against an invasion of the Carthaginians, he was appointed to command the auxiliary forces, and by a happy mixture of valour and prudence succeeded not only in restoring Syracuse to liberty, but he brought the whole island of Sicily into a more prosperous and tranquil state than it had been in for many years. He fixed his abode at Syracuse, and lived as a private citizen, distinguished only by his influence and the respect paid to his virtues. Died, B.C. 336.

TIMON, a Greek poet and philosopher of Peloponnesus, was the disciple of Pyrrho, and lived in the third century B.C. He wrote a number of comedies, tragedies, and satiric dramas; besides his satires, called "Silloi," which are still in part extant.

TIMON, the Misanthrope, was born near Athens, B.C. 420. It is related of him that he took a great pleasure in Alcibiades; and being asked the reason, said, "because I foresee that he will one day be the ruin of the Athenians."

TIMOTHEUS, the most celebrated lyric poet and musician of antiquity, was a native of Miletus, in Caria; and flourished at the court of Philip and his son Alexander. To him is attributed the completion of the lyre by four additional strings.

TIMOTEO, DA URBINO, an eminent painter, was born at Urbino, in 1470, and died in 1524.

TINDAL, MATTHEW, a controversial writer, was born at Beer-ferrie, in Devonshire. He received his education at Oxford, and was induced to turn Romanist in the reign of James II., but returned to the worship of the church of England, and took the oath at the Revolution. Died, 1733. His works are, "The Rights of the Christian Church," and "Christianity as Old as the Creation."

TINDAL, NICHOLAS, nephew to the foregoing, a divine, miscellaneous writer, and translator and continuator of Rapin's History of England. Born, 1647; died, 1774.

TINDAL, or TYNDALE, WILLIAM, one of the reformers, was born in 1500; studied at Oxford; but was obliged to leave that university on account of having imbibed the doctrines of Luther. He then withdrew to Cambridge, where he took a degree, and soon after went to reside as a tutor in the family of Sir John Welch, near Bristol. While in this capacity, he translated Erasmus's "Enchiridion Militis Christiani," into English; but, in consequence of his opinions, articles were preferred against him before the chancellor of the diocese, and he received a reprimand. Upon this he withdrew to London, and next to Antwerp, where he translated the New Testament into English. This version was printed in 1526; and the greater part being sent to England, the prelates Warham and Tunstall bought up all the copies they could procure, and caused them to be burnt. By means of the money thus received, Tyndale was enabled to print a new edition in 1534; after which he began a translation of the Old Testament, in which he was assisted by Miles Coverdale; but they proceeded no farther than the Pentateuch. Through the interference of the English government, Tyndale was apprehended at Antwerp; and, in 1536, being brought to trial at Augsburg, he was condemned to the stake, which sentence he quietly endured, being first strangled and then burnt. His last words were, "Lord, open the king of England's eyes!"

TINTORETTO, a celebrated painter, whose real name was GIACOMO ROBUSTI, was born at Venice, in 1512. He studied under Titian, the style of whose colouring he endeavoured to unite with the composition of Michael Angelo; and though he was far inferior to either of those great masters, he rose to high reputation, and was much employed. Died, 1594.—His daughter MARIA, who died in 1590, was distinguished as a portrait painter.

TIPPOO SAIB, sultan of Mysore, the son of Hyder Ally, was born in 1749, and succeeded to the throne in 1782. He continued the war in which his father was engaged with the English, until the peace of Paris (1783), which deprived him of the assistance of the French; and the alliance of the Marhattas with the British induced him to sign the treaty of Mangalore, in 1784, on advantageous terms. He, however, never ceased to cherish the hope of expelling the British from Hindostan; and carried on repeated wars with our native allies. At length the marquis Cornwallis, in 1792, compelled him to sue for a peace, which was granted on his paying a large sum of money, ceding part of his territories, and giving up his two sons to the English as hostages. Still implacable, he continued his plots against the English. The result was a second and final war, which terminated in 1799, by his death at the storming of Seringapatam.

patron of learning in the 15th century, was appointed lord-deputy of Ireland by Henry VI., and afterwards became lord high constable and lord high treasurer. After this he went on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem; and on his return presented many valuable manuscripts to the university of Oxford. On the temporary reverse of fortune experienced by Edward IV. and the house of York, he was accused of cruelty in his Irish administration, particularly towards two infant sons of the earl of Desmond, and condemned to lose his head on Tower-hill, which sentence was executed Oct. 18, 1470. He wrote many works, and was the great patron of Caxton the printer.

TIRABOSCHI, GIROLAMO, an eminent Italian author, was born at Bergamo, in 1731; entered into the society of the Jesuits; was librarian and counsellor to the duke of Modena, who knighted him; and died in 1794. His chief production is, "The History of Italian Literature," 16 vols. 4to.

TISCHBIEN, the name of several German artists, of the 18th century; all possessing considerable merit, but none of them sufficiently eminent to demand a separate notice here.

TISSOT, SIMON ANDREW, an eminent physician and medical writer, was born at Grancy, in the Pays de Vaud, in 1728. He was chiefly distinguished by his successful treatment of the confluent small-pox. He wrote several excellent professional works; was three years medical professor at Pavia; and refused advantageous offers made him by the kings of England and Poland to quit Lausanne, where he died in 1797. His works were collected by himself, and form 10 vols.

TITIAN, or TIZIANO VECELLI, an unrivalled portrait and landscape painter, was born in 1480, at Capo del Cadore, in Friuli; was a pupil of Zucchatti and Bellini; and improved his original style by studying the works of Giorgione. He was patronized and highly honoured by Charles V., who on one occasion, when the painter dropped his pencil, took it up, and said, "Titian merits to be served by Caesar." He lived to the age of 96, his powers continuing undiminished almost to the last; his works are consequently numerous, but they still retain their rank among the highest efforts of the art. He chiefly resided at Venice, where he died of the plague, in 1576.

TITUS VESPASIANUS, a Roman emperor, was born A.D. 40; and though his youth was tainted with the vice of dissipation, he happily disappointed the gloomy predictions of the people when he came to the throne, A.D. 79, by the wisdom and beneficence of his government. The Romans did not, however, long enjoy the blessings of his administration, Titus having been seized with a violent fever, which carried him off, in the forty-first year of his age, after a reign of little more than two years, A.D. 81.

TOBIN, JOHN, a dramatic writer, was born at Salisbury, in 1770, and bred to the law; but the stage had more attractions for him than the attorney's desk. He was the author of "The Honey Moon," and "Curfew." Died, 1804.

TOD, JAMES, a lieutenant-colonel in the service of the East India Company; author of "Annals of Rajasthan," and "Travels in Western India," the latter of which was scarcely completed when he died, Nov. 1835. Col. Tod surveyed Rajpootana, and completed his magnificent map in 1815; and it was by him that the name of Central India was originally given to that important and interesting tract of country. He was a sound scholar, indefatigable in research, and enthusiastic in his zeal to benefit the people for whom he laboured.

TOFINO DE SAN MIGUEL, a Spanish astronomer, was born at Carthagena, in 1740; entered the naval service, and became brigadier-general of the marine forces. During the American war he was employed in surveying the Spanish coasts; and died in 1806. He is the author of "Astronomical Observations made at Cadix," and other works.

TOLAND, JOHN, a deistical writer, was born in 1669, at Londonderry, in Ireland. He was originally a Roman Catholic, but became a dissenter, and lastly a sceptic. In 1696 he published "Christianity not Mysterious," a work which excited much notice, and gave rise to an almost interminable controversy. This was followed by various other publications, political, polemical, and philosophical; besides "Nazareus, or Jewish, Gentile, and Mahometan Christianity;" "Pantheisticon;" "Tetradyms;" "Amyntor;" and a "Life of Milton." Toland was employed on secret missions to various German courts, and received many valuable presents, particularly from prince Eugene. Died, 1722.

TOLER, JOHN, earl of Norbury, chief justice of the court of Common Pleas in Ireland, was born in 1745, at Beechwood, in the county of Tipperary. He was called to the bar in 1770; appointed king's counsel in 1781; solicitor-general in 1789; attorney-general in 1798, during which year he was actively engaged in the prosecution of the Irish rebels; and was advanced to the chief justiceship of the Common Pleas, in 1800, with the title of lord Norbury. This high office he retained till 1837, when on his retirement, he obtained a pension of 3045*l.* and was advanced to the title of viscount Glendine and earl of Norbury. He died in 1831. His lordship was an able judge; but he was chiefly known from his reputation for wit and drollery, and was consequently compelled to appear as the parent of many an illegitimate pun in the newspapers. It is perfectly true, however, that "lord Norbury's jokes" were sprinkled very thickly with his law, and the Dublin court of Common Pleas was often thronged with idlers attracted by the amusement which was to be found in the sallies of wit and repartee so freely bandied about from judge, counsel, and witnesses.

TOLLIVUS, JAMES, a physician, was born near Utrecht, in 1630. He became professor of eloquence and Greek at Brandenburg, and died in 1696. Among his works are, "Epistolæ Itherarum," and "Fortuna Sæcra." In this last he evinced an extraordinary degree of credulity, by supposing that the secret of the philosopher's stone was concealed under the mythology of paganism.

TOMLINE, GEORGE, an eminent English prelate, whose family name was Prettyman, was born at Bury St. Edmund's, in Suffolk, in 1750. He was senior wrangler at Cambridge, in 1773; and having been chosen fellow of Pembroke college in 1781, he served the office of moderator. He had been the academical tutor of Mr. Pitt, who on becoming chancellor of the exchequer, made him his private secretary, gave him the living of Sudbury, and a prebend of Westminster, and, in 1797, raised him to the see of Lincoln; from which, in 1820, he was translated to that of Winchester. In 1799, he published a work entitled "Elements of Christian Theology," 2 vols.; and in 1813 appeared his "Refutation of the Charge of Calvinism against the Church of England." He also published the "Life of the Right Hon. William Pitt." He took the name of Tomline, in consequence of a person to whom he was almost unknown, having bequeathed him a very considerable fortune, on that special condition.

TOMLINS, ELIZABETH SOPHIA, a poetess, novelist, and miscellaneous writer, was born in London, in 1768. She wrote "The Victim of Fancy," and other novels; "Tributes of Affection," and much fugitive poetry in various periodicals. She also translated the first history of Napoleon Buonaparte that ever appeared in this country; and part of "Anquetil's Universal History." Died, 1838.

TONE, THEOBALD WOLFE, an Irish revolutionary politician, and founder of the "society of united Irishmen," was born in Dublin, in 1763, and was bred to the bar. In 1790, he published a pamphlet, the object of which was to expose the mismanagement of the English government regarding Ireland, and, in 1793, he established the society above mentioned. He afterwards became involved in a treasurable correspondence with France, but made a sort of compromise with the British government, and was allowed to withdraw himself. He accordingly went to America in 1795; from whence he proceeded to France in the following year. By his persuasions, the French directory fitted out an expedition, consisting of seventeen sail of the line, thirteen frigates, &c., with 14,000 troops on board, and upwards of 40,000 stand of arms, besides artillery and warlike stores. Tone was appointed chef de brigade, under general Hoche, the commander-in-chief. They set sail Dec. 15, 1796; but before they had all reached their destination, (Bantry-bay), a hurricane arose, in consequence of which three ships of the line and a frigate only remained together. This bold attempt being thus frustrated by the elements, the scattered ships made the best of their way back to France; and Tone was foiled in all his future endeavours to persuade the French government to undertake another expedition on a large scale. But he still persevered in those plans which he conceived would lead to a separation of Ireland from Great Britain; and he at length embarked in one of those petty armaments, the inefficiency of which, he thought, perhaps, might be remedied by his own courage and experience. He was taken prisoner in the Hoche, after fighting bravely in a desperate action, was tried by a military commission, and sentenced to be hanged. The execution of his sentence, however, he avoided, by cutting his own throat in prison, Nov. 19, 1798.

TOOKE, WILLIAM, a miscellaneous writer, was born in 1744, at Islington. He was originally a printer; but, in 1771, he obtained episcopal ordination, and was appointed minister of the church at Cronstadt. In 1774 he became chaplain to the factory at St. Petersburg; and after residing there many years, he returned to his own country, and died in 1830. His principal works are, "Varieties in Literature," 2 vols.; "The Life of Catherine II.," "A View of the Russian Empire;" "A General History of Russia;" and translations of "Lucian" and "Zollukofer's Sermons and Prayers."

TOOKE, JOHN HORNE, a politician and philologist, who for many years was known by his family name of Horne, was born in Westminster, in 1736; was educated at Westminster and Eton schools, and St. John's college, Cambridge; and in 1760 was inducted to the chapelry of New Brentford. The clerical profession being little suited to his habits and feelings, he took an active part in politics, and became the partizan of Wilkes; till, on founding the "Society for supporting the Bill of Rights," a quarrel arose between them, each charging the other with venality and hypocrisy. In 1771, he was fiercely attacked by Junius; but he defended himself with spirit and success against that formidable writer. Resigning his living at Brentford, he studied the law at the Temple, but his ecclesiastical character proved an obstacle to his being admitted to the bar. He was a warm opponent of the American war; and, in 1775, was prosecuted, and sentenced to a year's imprisonment and a fine, on a charge of having libelled the king's troops in America. He defended himself with his characteristic spirit and acuteness; and out of this circumstance arose his "Letter to Dunning," which formed the basis of his subsequent philological work, "The Diversions of Purley," published in 1786. In 1790, he stood, ineffectually, as candidate for Westminster, as he did again in 1796. In the year 1794 he was committed to the Tower on the charge of high treason, founded on the presumed objects of the corresponding societies to overthrow the constitution; but had the good fortune, along with the other persons accused at the same time, to be acquitted; and he appears to have been much more cautious afterwards in the choice of his companions. In 1801 he was returned to parliament for Old Sarum, but he sat only during that session, a bill being passed to render clerical persons ineligible as members of the House of Commons for the future. His latter days were cheered by easy circumstances; and he died at Wimbledon, in 1812, aged 76.

TOPLADY, AUGUSTUS MONTAGUE, a zealous advocate for the Calvinism of the church of England, was born at Farnham, in Surrey, in 1740; was educated at Westminster school, and at Trinity college, Dublin; and died, vicar of Broad Henbury, in Devonshire, in 1778. Toplady was a strenuous opponent of Wesley, and brought a large share of metaphysical acuteness into the Calvinistic controversy. His works form 6 vols.

TORDENSKIOLD, PETER, whose family name was WESSEL, was a celebrated Danish admiral, born in 1691, at Drontheim, in Norway; and was killed in a duel, in 1720. For his gallant exploits his sovereign gave him the name of Tordenskiold, compounded from words signifying thunder and shield. Among his achievements were the capturing of a Swedish squadron in the port of Dynekin, and the taking of the town of Marstrand and the citadel of Carlstein.

TORELLI, GIUSEPPE, an Italian writer, was born at Verona, in 1721. Besides the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages, he was well acquainted with French, Spanish and English; and he had also an extensive knowledge of antiquities; but his favourite study was the mathematics, of his proficiency in which a proof has been given in his edition of the works of Archimedes, printed in folio, at Oxford. He died in 1781. Torelli translated Æsop's Fables into Latin, and the first two books of the Æneid into Italian.

TORFÆUS, THERMODUS, a Danish historian, was born in Iceland, in 1640; educated at Copenhagen; and was afterwards appointed historiographer for Norway. Among his works are, "Historia rerum Norvegiarum," 2 vols.; "Series Dynastiarum et Regum Danie;" and "Historia Vinlandie Antiquæ."

TORQUEMADA, THOMAS DE, the first inquisitor-general of Spain, whose memory is rendered infamous for barbarity, was born in 1420. He was a monk of the order of St. Dominic; became inquisitor-general in 1483; and died in 1498. During the exercise of his power, in the course of sixteen years, it is said, that no less than 8,800 victims were committed to the flames, 90,000 were condemned to perpetual imprisonment and other severe punishments, and above 800,000 Jews were banished from Spain.

TORRE, FILIPPO DEL, an Italian prelate and antiquary, who was born at Ciudad de Friuli, in 1657. He became bishop of Adria, where he died in 1717. His principal writings are, "Monumenta veteris Antii;" "Tauromolium Antiquum;" and "De Annis Imperii M. Antonii Aurelii Helio-gabali."

TORRE, GIOVANNI MARIA DELLA, an eminent natural philosopher, was born at Rome; studied at the Clementine college; became professor of philosophy and the mathematics at Ciudad de Friuli; and afterwards, settling at Naples, was appointed librarian to the king, superintendent of the royal printing-office, and keeper of the museum. He made great improvements in the magnifying power of microscopes, and published works on "Natural Philosophy;" "Microscopical Observations," &c. Died, 1782.

ral, was born at Londonderry, in 1779; received his education in the military academy at Dublin; entered as an ensign in the 52d regiment of foot; and, going to the West Indies, was early distinguished for bravery in actual service, and for courage in enduring hardships. He afterwards served in Holland, where he was wounded; next proceeded to join the army in Egypt; thence embarked at a port of the Red Sea for Bombay; but being seized with a coup-de-soleil, he was obliged to take his passage to England. The ship touched at St. Helena, where, recovering his health and spirits, he married Miss Patton, the governor's daughter. He was present at the attack on Buenos Ayres, and gave his testimony on the trial of general Whitelock in a manner that evinced his judgment and integrity. He was appointed secretary to Sir Arthur Wellesley, and accompanied him to Portugal. In March, 1820, Sir Henry was made adjutant-general, in which situation he revised the army regulations, and introduced many essential improvements. Died, 1828.

TORRICELLI, EVANGELISTA, a celebrated Italian mathematician, was born in 1608, at Faenza; began his education under the Jesuits there, and completed it at Rome; was invited to Florence by Galileo; and succeeded that eminent man as professor of mathematics. The grand duke also appointed him his mathematician. He wrote several geometrical works; and to him science is indebted for the invention of the barometer.

TORRIGIANO, PIETRO, a Florentine sculptor, of great eminence, was born in 1472. Being a fellow student with the famous Michael Angelo Buonarroti, a dispute arising from a jealousy with respect to their comparative proficiency, terminated in blows; one of which, from the hand of Torrigiano, broke the bridge of his antagonist's nose. While in the zenith of his reputation, he went to England, which he afterwards quitted for Spain, and there fell into the hands of the Inquisition, being denounced as guilty of impiety and sacrilege, in breaking to pieces a statue of the virgin, which he had himself executed for a nobleman, who afterwards refused to pay him an adequate price. He was condemned to the stake; but avoided the torture of a public execution, by starving himself in prison, previously to the celebration of the auto da fe, in 1522. The beautiful tomb of Henry VII., in Westminster abbey, is the work of Torrigiano.

TORRIJOS, DON JOSE MARIA, a Spanish patriot, who served against the French during the war of independence, and, gradually passing through the inferior posts, obtained the rank of colonel on the field of battle. He was in disgrace after the return of Ferdinand VII.; but in 1820, the Cortes made him field-marshal, and chief commandant of Navarre and the Basque provinces. When the French invaded Spain, Torrijos held out to the last; he signed the capitulation of Carthagená after Cadiz had surrendered, and gave up his arms to general Mina; but having subsequently resolved to renew his efforts for the liberation of Spain, he quitted his asylum at Gibraltar, but on repairing to Malaga, he and his companions were made prisoners, tried by a court-martial, and shot.

TORRINGTON, GEORGE BYNG, viscount, was the son of John, the fifth viscount Torrington, and was born in London, in 1768. He was entered a midshipman on board the Thunderer, at ten years of age, and was present in the action between admiral Keppel and the count d'Orvilliers, on the 27th July, 1778. He joined the flag-ship of Sir Edward Hughes, in the East Indies, and was in the actions with M. Souffrin. In June, 1795, he was made post-captain; in 1797 he had the command of the Galatea frigate, in which he captured a French corvette, and some armed vessels; but ill health compelled him to resign the command in 1802. In December, 1812, his uncle, the fourth viscount, died, to whose title his father succeeded; but he dying fourteen days after, captain Byng became viscount Torrington. He at that time commanded the Warrior, in which ship he conveyed the prince of Orange from the Downs, in Nov. 1813, and landed him at Schwelling. After that service, he conveyed a fleet of merchant ships to the West Indies. During that period a promotion took place, which made him rear-admiral of the blue; and he was made vice-admiral in 1821. He died in 1831.

TORSTENSON, LEONARDO, count, a celebrated Swedish general, was born in 1523; commenced his career as page to Gustavus Adolphus, and was rapidly promoted for his military talent by that monarch; and distinguished himself on numerous occasions during the thirty years' war. Died, 1634.

TOSCANELLA, PAUL, an astronomer of the 15th century. He erected in the cathedral of Florence the famous gnomon, of which father Ximenes published a curious description. Died, 1490.

TOTILA, king of the Ostrogoths in Italy, succeeded to the throne in 541. He overran Italy, and took possession of Rome. At length the emperor Justinian, resolving to free Italy, recalled Belisarius from the Persian war, and dispatched a powerful army to its relief, under the able and valiant Narses, with which he advanced directly towards Rome. The opposing forces met, and a furious battle took place; the army of Totila was totally vanquished, and being overtaken in his flight by a party of Gepidæ, their commander, Asbad, ran him through the body with a lance; and with him expired the revived glory of the Goths in Italy, A.D. 552.

TOTT, FRANCIS, baron de, a French negotiator and officer, was born, in 1733, at Chamigny, and after having served in the army, was employed in the French embassy at Constantinople. In 1767 he was appointed consul in the Crimea. He subsequently went back to Constantinople, and was charged by the grand seignor to carry into effect various important reforms in the military department. He was promoted on his return to France, but emigrated in 1790, and died 1793.

TOURNEFORT, JOSEPH PITTON DE, an eminent botanist, was born in 1656, at Aix, in Provence. He manifested very early in life a love of botany; studied medicine and anatomy at Montpellier; travelled in various parts of Europe and Asia; was professor of physic in the royal college, and of botany in the king's garden at Paris; and died in 1768. The method established by Tournefort was founded upon the varieties of the petals of flowers, taken in conjunction with the fruit; and it soon became highly popular from its facility. Among his works are, "Voyages in the Levant;" "Elements of Botany;" and a "History of Plants in the neighbourhood of Paris."

TOUSSAINT L'OUVERTURE, a celebrated negro chieftain, of great courage, intelligence, and activity, was born in 1745, at St. Domingo. His early years were spent in slavery on the estate of count Noe, where his excellent conduct attracted the attention of M. Bayon de Libertas, the agent of the estate, who taught him reading, writing, and arithmetic. When the general rising of the blacks took place, the abilities and courage of Toussaint soon raised him to the highest rank among them. By his wise and vigorous measures, he succeeded in expelling the English, reducing the Spanish part of the island, and restoring peace and order in the colony; for which the central assembly of St. Domingo voted him the dignity of president for life. The first care of Toussaint was to form a system of civil policy, suited to the state of the colony; for which purpose he introduced many useful regulations, tending to improve the moral state of the blacks, and to induce habits of industry among them. By these means the colony began to revive, and was rapidly advancing in prosperity under the administration of this negro chief, when suddenly the whole state of affairs was changed. Anxious to recover so valuable a colony, Buonaparte, in 1801, despatched general Leclerc, with a fleet and army; a desperate contest ensued; and after a short, but brave resistance, Toussaint was overcome. He was sent a prisoner to France, and died in the fortress of Joux, in 1803.

TOWERS, JOSEPH, a political and miscellaneous writer, was born, in 1737, in Southwark, where his father was a dealer in second-hand books. He was, successively, a printer, a bookseller, and a preacher among the Unitarians; received the degree of LL.D. from the university of Edinburgh; and died in 1799. Among his works are, "British Biography;" a "Life of Frederic, King of Prussia;" "A Vindication of the Political Opinions of Mr. Locke;" "Observations on the Rights and Duties of Juries;" and many political and other tracts. He also contributed to Dr. Kippis's edition of the Biographia Britannica.

TOWGOOD, MATTHEW, a dissenting minister, born in 1750, at Axminster, in Devonshire, where his father was a physician. He was the author of "The Dissenter's Apology;" "High-flown Episcopal and Priestly Claims freely examined," &c. In 1761 he became the head of an academy at Exeter, for the education of dissenting ministers; and died, aged 92, in 1792.

tiquary and collector, was born of an ancient family at Towney-hall, in Lancashire. He resided many years at Rome, where he employed himself in collecting the remains of ancient art; and having formed a museum, replete with valuable manuscripts, medals, vases, urns, &c., he purchased two houses in Park-street, Westminster, for their reception. The Towney marbles are now in the British Museum, of which Mr. Towney was a trustee. Died, 1805.—His uncle, JOHN TOWNLEY, was an officer in the French service, and honored with the order of St. Louis. He translated "Hedibras" into French; and died in 1782.

TOWNSEND, JOSEPH, a physician, divine, and writer, was born about 1740; was educated at Caius college, Cambridge; studied physic under Dr. Cullen, at Edinburgh, but became chaplain to lady Huntingdon, and obtained the living of Pewsey, Wilts. He was eminent as a scholar, mineralogist, and conchologist; and was the author of "Travels in Spain;" "The Physician's Vade Mecum;" "A Guide to Health;" "Sermons;" and "The Character of Moses as an Historian established." Died, 1816.

TOWNSEND, JOHN, founder of the deaf and dumb asylum, was born in London, in 1757. He settled as a minister to an independent congregation at Kingston, in Surrey, whence, in 1784, he removed to Bermondsey, where he continued to reside during the remainder of his life. With the assistance of the Rev. H. C. Mason, parochial minister of Bermondsey, he, in 1792, founded the institution for the deaf and dumb children of indigent parents; which excellent charity obtained such efficient patronage, that, in 1807, an edifice, since much enlarged, was erected under the auspices of the late duke of Gloucester. Mr. Townsend also actively assisted in the formation of the Missionary Society, the Female Penitentiary, and other religious and charitable associations; besides instituting a congregational school, for the gratuitous education of the children of necessitous dissenting ministers. He was a coadjutor with the Rev. Mr. Mason in his "Family Bible," and was the author of "Hints on Sunday Schools and Itinerant Preaching," "Nine Discourses on Prayer," &c. Died, 1826.

TOWNSON, Dr. THOMAS, a distinguished clergyman of the established church, was a native of Essex, and born in 1715. Through the influence of Dr. Porteus, bishop of London, he obtained some valuable church preferment, of which the livings of Hatfield, Peverill, and Malpas, were a part. He published several devotional tracts of great merit, a series of sermons on the Gospels, and a posthumous treatise on evangelical history. Died, 1792.

TRADESCANT, JOHN, a Dutch naturalist, traveller, and antiquary, who, after visiting various parts of Europe, settled in England, established at Lambeth a garden of exotics, and was appointed gardener to Charles I. He died about 1652. His son, JOHN, who died in 1662, published, with the title of "Museum Tradescantianum," a description of his father's collection of curiosities, which have since formed the nucleus of the Ashmolean museum at Oxford.

TRAILL, ROBERT, a presbyterian divine, was born at Ely, in the county of Fife, in 1642. He was educated at Edinburgh; but afterwards went to Holland, whence he returned in the reign of Charles II., and suffered imprisonment under the covenanters' act. On gaining his liberty, he removed to London, and became minister to a congregation of dissenters. He was a rigid Calvinist; and his works are very popular among persons of that persuasion.—Dr. JAMES TRAILL, his grandson, conformed to the established church, and became bishop of Down and Connor. Died, 1783.

TRAJAN, a Roman emperor, celebrated in history for his mild and equitable government, and for his valour in the field. He was born A.D. 52, and died in 117. During his reign the Roman empire was at its greatest extent.

TRAPP, JOSEPH, a divine and poet, was born in 1679, at Cherlington, in Gloucestershire; was educated at Wadham college, Oxford, at which university he was professor of poetry; became evening lecturer at St. Martin's church, London; rector of Harlington, Middlesex; and died in 1747. His principal works are, a blank verse translation of Virgil's Æneid; "Prælectiones Poeticæ;" "Sermons;" "Miscellaneous Poems;" "Abramule," a tragedy; and a "Latin Translation of Milton's Paradise Lost." He was strongly attached to high church principles; was an eloquent preacher; and, besides the works before-mentioned, was the author of several polemical treatises.

TRAVIS, GEORGE, an English divine, who distinguished himself by some acute letters to Mr. Gibbon, in which he strenuously maintained the genuineness of the controverted passage in 1 John, chap. v. 7. Died, 1797.

TREBY, Sir GEORGE, an able judge and lawyer, was born at Plympton, in Devonshire, in 1644; became a commoner of Exeter college, Oxford; studied in the Inner Temple; and was called to the bar. He also sat in parliament for his native place; and in 1681 was appointed recorder of London, and knighted. Of this office he was deprived in 1683; but recovered it at the Revolution, and successfully became solicitor and attorney-general, and chief justice of the Common Pleas. Died, 1702.

TREMBLEY, ABRAHAM, an eminent naturalist, was born in 1700, at Geneva. After having been tutor to the families of lord Bentinck and the duke of Richmond, he returned in 1757 to his native city, where he became one of the members of the great council. He first acquired notice as a naturalist by his "Memoirs on Fresh Water Polypes," and was admitted into the Royal Society, and other learned bodies. He also wrote "Instructions from a Father to his Children on Nature and Religion;" "Instructions on Natural and Revealed Religion;" and "Inquiries into the Principles of Virtue and Happiness." Died, 1794.

TRENCHARD, JOHN, a political writer of the Whig party, son of a secretary of state to William III., was born in 1686, in Somersetshire; quitted the bar, and was appointed commissioner of forfeited estates in Ireland; and died in 1723. He wrote "The Natural History of Superstition," and various political tracts and pamphlets; and, in conjunction with Gordon, was the translator of Tacitus, and "Cato's Letters."

TRENCK, FREDERIC, baron Von, a Prussian officer, celebrated for his adventures and misfortunes, was born in 1726, at Königsberg, and made such rapid progress in his studies, that, at the age of seventeen, he was presented to the king as a student, who was well worthy the royal patronage. Frederic rapidly advanced him in the army, and manifested much regard for him; but the accomplishments of Trenck having won the heart of the princess Amelia, the king's sister, he resolved to punish him. He was imprisoned in the fortress of Galtz, but contrived to effect his escape. He then visited the north of Europe, Austria, and Italy. In 1758 he was seized at Dantzic, and was conveyed to Magdeburgh, where, loaded with irons, he was for years incarcerated. On procuring his liberation, in 1763, he withdrew to Vienna; after which he went to Aix-la-Chapelle, where literature, politics, and commerce, alternately engaged his attention. He next went to reside at his castle of Zwerbeck, in Hungary, and while there he published his own "Memoirs." In 1791 he settled in France; and in 1794, having been charged with being a secret emissary of the king of Prussia, he closed his eventful career under the axe of the guillotine.

TRESHAM, HENRY, a painter and poet, was born in Ireland, and was a pupil of West, of Dublin. He resided in Italy fourteen years, during which he greatly improved himself in the art, and made a valuable collection of articles of virtù; and on his return to England he became a royal academician. He was the author of three poems, "The Sea-sick Minstrel;" "Rome at the close of the Eighteenth Century;" and "Britannicus to Buona-

TRESSAN, LOUIS ELIZABETH DE LA VERONE, count de, a distinguished French officer and writer, was born in 1705, at Mons; entered the army in 1723; was conspicuous for his valour during several campaigns, particularly at the battle of Fontenoy; was appointed grand marshal of the court of Stanislaus at Lorraine, in 1750; was admitted into the French academy in 1781; and died in 1783. His works, published in 12 vols., contain his miscellaneous pieces, and his translations of Amadis de Gaul, The Orlando Furioso, and several old French romances. He did not, however, wholly confine himself to subjects of mere amusement, but produced a "Treatise on Electricity," and some other works of science.

TRIBONIAN, a celebrated Roman lawyer, was born about the beginning of the sixth century, at Sida, in Pamphylia; obtained reputation at the bar; and rose, through a succession of state offices, to those of praetorian prefect, and consul. The emperor Justinian entrusted to him the superintendence of his new code of laws; the result of which was the celebrated Digest and Pandects, which would have transmitted his name with honour to posterity, had not his rapacity and venality been at least equal to his talents. Died, 547.

TRIMMER, SARAH, a literary lady, of an active and intelligent mind, the daughter of Joshua Kirby, who wrote on Perspective, was born in 1741, at Ipswich, and was early initiated in classical as well as in English literature. She wrote a variety of useful works, well calculated to promote the diffusion of education; and died in 1810.

TRISSINO, GIOVANNI GIORGIO, an Italian poet, was born in 1478, at Vicenza; was educated at Rome and Milan; was employed by Leo X. and his successor, Clement, on various diplomatic missions; and died in 1558. Among his works are, "The Deliverance of Italy from the Goths," an epic poem; a treatise on the "Art of Poetry;" and the tragedy of "Sophonisba."

TRISTAN L'HERMITE, FRANCIS, a French dramatic poet, was born at Souliers, in La Marche, in 1601; and died in 1649.

TRIVET, NICHOLAS, an English Dominican, was the son of Sir Thomas Trivet, chief justice of the King's Bench. He was educated at Oxford; and was the author of "Annales Regum Angliæ." Died, 1328.

TROGUS POMPEIUS, a Roman historian, was born in Gallia Narbonensis, and lived in the reign of Augustus, in whose court his father was an officer. Trogus wrote a "Universal History," of which there is an abridgment by Justin.

TROLLOPE, ANTHONY, a barrister-at-law; the husband of the celebrated Mrs. Trollope, whose sketches and novels have attained so much popularity. Died, at Bruges, 1835.

TROMP, MARTIN HARPERTZDOON, a celebrated Dutch admiral, was born in 1597, at Brill; began his naval career at an early age, and was taken prisoner in a combat with an English privateer, on board which he continued two years. He subsequently entered the service of the states-general, and became admiral of Holland. He defeated the Spaniards in 1637 and 1639; fought with great gallantry against the English, during the war which began in 1652; and was killed in the engagement in 1653.—CORNELIUS TROMP, son of the preceding, who was born in 1629, and died in 1691, emulated the fame of his father, particularly in the fourth day's action in the Downs, in June, 1666. After the conclusion of peace, in 1675, Tromp made a visit to London, where he was honourably received by Charles II., who created him a baronet.

TRONCHIN, THEODORE, an eminent physician, was born in 1709, at Geneva; and being maternally related to lord Bellingbrooke, he was sent to England, to be educated at Cambridge. He studied medicine under Boerhaave, at Leyden; and having taken the degree of M.D., he first settled at Amsterdam, and afterwards at his native city; but subsequently removed to Paris, on being appointed physician to the duke of Orleans. Tronchin was a man of consummate skill in his profession, and of great benevolence. He was the friend of Voltaire, Rousseau, and many other celebrated characters, who have ennobled his talents and his virtues in their writings. Died, 1781.

TROTTER, THOMAS, M.D., an eminent medical writer, was a native of Roxburghshire, and educated at the university of Edinburgh. After being duly qualified, he was appointed a surgeon in the navy, in 1782; obtained his doctor's degree at Edinburgh, in 1788; was appointed physician to the royal hospital at Portsmouth, in 1793, and, in the following year, physician to the fleet. He introduced many improvements into the medical discipline of the navy; was indefatigable in his endeavours to mitigate the pernicious effects of the scurvy; and was completely successful in repressing a putrid fever which broke out among the French prisoners taken on the 1st of June, 1794. On his retirement from the public service, he settled at Newcastle as a physician; and died there in 1832. He wrote many useful works, of which the following are the principal: "Medical and Chemical Essays;" "Medica Nautica, or an Essay on the Diseases of Seamen;" "A Practical Treatise on Nervous, Bilious, Stomach, and Liver Complaints;" an "Essay on Drunkenness;" a "Review of the Medical Department of the British Navy;" "The Noble Foundling," a tragedy; a volume of poems, &c.

TROY, FRANCIS DE, a French painter, was born at Toulouse, in 1648; and died, at Paris, in 1730. His principal performances are in the Hotel de Ville, of Paris, and the church of St. Genevieve, in the same city.

TRUCHET, JOHN, a French mathematician, was born in 1657, at Lyons. On entering into the order of Carmelites, he obtained the name of father Sebastian; but, notwithstanding his monastic life, he devoted a considerable part of his time to scientific and mechanical pursuits, particularly hydraulics, which occasioned his being consulted in the making of the grand canal of France. He also contributed, by his discoveries, to the improvement of various manufactures.

TRUEBA, DON TELEFONO DE, a Spaniard, who, on the overthrow of the constitutional party, came, with his mother, to England, where he was educated. He was a man of very considerable talent, as may be seen by his having written dramas in Spanish, French, and English, which were produced at the different national theatres with success. Amongst his English dramatic pieces were the popular farces of "Call again To-morrow," and "Mr. and Mrs. Pringle;" besides some comedies, which were not equally successful. He also wrote "The Castilian," "The Incognito," "Paris and London," "Salvador the Guerilla," and other novels; and was a frequent contributor to many of the periodicals. In 1834 he returned to Spain, with many of his more distinguished countrymen, and was soon after elected a member of the Chamber of Procuradores, and secretary to one of the committees. Died, aged 31, 1835.

TRUMBULL, SIR WILLIAM, an eminent statesman, was born at East Hempstead, in Berkshire, in 1638. He studied at Oxford, and having taken the degree of doctor of laws, was admitted a civilian in the Commons. After this he was employed in state affairs; and in 1664 received the honour of knighthood. He went on diplomatic missions to France and Constantinople; was subsequently made a lord of the treasury and secretary of state; and died in 1716. Sir William was the friend of Dryden, and the patron of Pope, in whose correspondence are many of his letters.

TRUSLER, DR. JOHN, was born in London, in 1735; was brought up as an apothecary, but got into orders, and for a time officiated as a curate. He published abridgments of popular sermons, printed in imitation of manuscript, for the use of the pulpit: this turned out a profitable speculation, and led to his commencing business as a bookseller, by which, and the numerous compilations he produced, he realized a good fortune. Died, 1820.

TRYPHIODORUS, a poet, who, according to Suidas, was a native of Egypt, and is supposed to have lived during the fifth century. He is called the Grammarian; and wrote a poem, in Greek, on the destruction of Troy.

TSCHIRNER, HENRY THEOPHILOS, an eminent German theologian and pulpit orator, was born, in 1778, near Chemnitz; was professor of theology at Wittenberg; and died in 1828. He wrote "The Fall of Paganism;" "Christian Apologetics;" "A Treatise on Catholicism and Protestantism, considered in a political point of view," &c.

TSCHIRNHAUSEN, EHRENFRED WALTHER, VON, a German geometrician and experimental philosopher, was born in 1651, in Lusatia, and was lord of Killenwald and Stolzenberg, in that country. He studied at Leyden; and, after having served in the army, and travelled, he devoted himself to scientific pursuits. He established several glass-houses to improve the glass used for optical instruments; constructed an enormous burning mirror; gave rise to the manufacture of Saxony porcelain; and discovered a particular kind of curve, endowed with very remarkable properties, called, after him, Tschirnhausen's Caustics. He wrote "De Medicinis Mentis et Corporis," and some philosophical papers. Died, 1706.

TUCKER, ABRAHAM, a metaphysical writer, was born in 1705, in London; and was educated at Merton college, Oxford; then studied at the Inner Temple, but was not called to the bar. His great work is "The Light of Nature pursued," 7 vols., of which the first half was published by himself, under the fictitious name of Edward Search, Esq., and the remaining volumes were printed after the death of the author, which occurred in 1774.

TUCKER, JOSIAH, a shrewd writer on political economy, was born in 1712, at Langham, in Caermarthenshire; was educated at St. John's college, Oxford; and was successively curate of All Saints, and rector of St. Stephen's, Bristol, minor canon and prebendary in the cathedral, and dean of Gloucester. During the American war, he published many pamphlets, and strenuously recommended the separation of the colonies from Great Britain, as conducive to their mutual interest. He died in 1799. Among his works are, "A Treatise on Civil Government;" "Sermons;" "Elements of Commerce;" and "An Apology for the Church of England."

TUCKER, ST. GEORGE, an American lawyer and statesman, distinguished in his own country by the title of "The American Blackstone," was a zealous promoter of the independence of the United States, and bore a part in its accomplishment, not only with his pen, but his sword. Died, 1822.

TUCKEY, JAMES HINGSTON, a nautical writer, was born in 1778, at Greenhill, in the county of Cork; entered the navy at an early age; went to India in 1794; was employed in surveying the coast of New South Wales; was taken prisoner by the French in 1803, and remained in captivity till 1814. He was then selected to command the expedition for exploring the river Congo, where he died, in 1816. He was the author of "Maritime Geography," 4 vols.

TULL, JETHRO, an agricultural writer, was a native of Oxfordshire, and born about 1680. He studied at the Temple, and was admitted a barrister; but, returning from his travels, he settled on his paternal estate, and devoted himself to agriculture. Tull is the inventor of the horse-hoeing system of husbandry, on which he wrote a valuable volume. This was reprinted by Mr. Cobbett, and warmly espoused by him.

TULLIUS HOSTILIUS, the third king of the Romans, who succeeded Numa Pompilius, and died a. c. 640.

TULLY, THOMAS, a learned divine, and controversial writer, was born at Carille, in 1630; and died in 1676. Dr. Tully wrote "Logica Apodictica," "Præcipiorum Theologia," and several controversial pieces against Dr. Bull and Mr. Baxter, on the subject of justification.

TULLY, GEORGE, a learned divine; author of a "Discourse on the Government of the Thoughts;" and several sermons and tracts against popery. Died, 1697.

TULP, NICHOLAS, an eminent physician and distinguished patriot, was born at Amsterdam, in 1593. He not only rose to eminence in his profession, but being elected burghmaster of Holland, at a very advanced age, he so strenuously encouraged his countrymen in their resistance to the unprincipled invasion of Holland, by Louis XIV. in 1672, that a silver medal was struck to his honour, with the motto, "Vires ultra sortemque senectæ."

TUNSTALL, or TONSTAL, CUTHBERT, an eminent English prelate, was born at Hatchford, in Yorkshire, about 1474. He held various appointments, legal and ecclesiastical; in 1516 he was made master of the rolls, and the same year was sent ambassador with Sir Thomas More, to the emperor Charles V. then at Brusa. In 1522 he was made bishop of London; in the following year appointed keeper of the privy seal; and in 1533 he was translated to the see of Durham. Under Edward VI. he was sent to the Tower, where he remained till the accession of Mary, when he obtained his release, and was restored to his bishopric. He conducted himself with great moderation during this sanguinary reign, and would not suffer any Protestants to be molested in his diocese. On the accession of Elizabeth he was again deprived, and committed to the custody of archbishop Parker, at Lambeth, where he died in 1559.

TUNSTALL, JAMES, a learned divine, was born about 1710, and died in 1772. Dr. Tunstall wrote "Discourses upon Natural and Revealed Religion," and other works.

TURBERVILLE, GEORGE, an English poet, was born at Whitechurch, in Dorsetshire, about 1630. After being educated at Winchester and New college, Oxford, he went as secretary to Sir Thomas Randolph, ambassador at the court of Russia; of which country he wrote a description, in three poetical epistles. He published "Songs and Sonnets;" translations of the "Heracal Epistles of Ovid;" and "Tragic Tales." Died about 1660.

TURENNE, HENRY DE LA TOUR D'AUVERNE, viscount de, an illustrious French commander, born in 1611, at Sedan, was the second son of the duke of Bouillon, and of Elizabeth, daughter of William I., prince of Orange. He studied the art of war under his uncle, prince Maurice of Nassau, and, in 1634, received the command of a French regiment. Having, by repeated services, obtained a marshal's baton with the chief command of the army in Germany, he crossed the Rhine, and after a train of skillful operations, and brilliant victories, concluded the peace of the Pyrenees. In 1667, Turenne renounced the Protestant religion; which measure is rather supposed to have proceeded from ambitions than pious motives. On the renewal of the war with Holland, in 1672, he took forty towns in less than a month; drove the elector of Brandenburg to Berlin; and compelled the imperial army to recross the Rhine. He suited his glory, however, by his barbarous conduct in the Palatinate, which country he utterly devastated by fire and sword. In 1675 he was opposed to Montecuculi; and they were about to come to an engagement at Sasbach, in Baden, when Turenne, while reconnoitring for the purpose of finding a place for the erection of a battery, was killed by a cannon-ball, July 27, 1675.

TURGOT, ANNE ROBERT JACQUES, an eminent French statesman, was born at Paris in 1727. He studied at the Sorbonne, and was intended for the church, but relinquished the clerical profession, and in 1761 was appointed intendant of Limoges, which office he held for twelve years. In 1774, he was made comptroller general of the finances, and did much to free commerce from its many fetters, and to encourage industry; but his benevolent views were thwarted by intrigues, and he was removed in 1776. Died, 1781.

ralist and divine of the 16th century, was born at Morpeth, in Northumberland; was educated at Pembroke-hall, Cambridge; became dean of Wells; and died in 1568. He wrote among other things, a "History of Plants," which is the earliest English herbal.

TURNER, FRANCIS, bishop of Ely, was one of the seven bishops prosecuted for resisting the royal authority in ecclesiastical affairs under James II.; yet he refused to take the oath of allegiance to William III., and was consequently deprived of his benefice. Died, 1700. He wrote "Animadversions on Naked Truth;" and was answered by Marvell, who gave him the title of "The Divine in Mode." The bishop was also the author of a "Vindication of Archbishop Sancroft, and the rest of the deprived Bishops."

TURNER, SAMUEL, a traveller and diplomatist, was born in Gloucestershire, about 1749. He entered the military service of the East India Company, and having attracted the favourable notice of governor Hastings, was sent on an embassy to congratulate the new potentate of Thibet, in 1783. In the war with Tippoo Saib, this officer distinguished himself at the siege of Seringapatam; and being afterwards sent ambassador to the sovereign of Mysore, acquitted himself so much to the satisfaction of the Company, that they rewarded him with a handsome present. He returned to England, and published his "Account of an Embassy to the Court of the Teshoo Lama in Thibet," &c. Died, 1802.

TURNER, DR. EDWARD, M.D., F.R.S., professor of chemistry, at University college, London, was born at Jamaica, in 1797; was educated in England; graduated as doctor of medicine in Edinburgh; and afterwards spent two years at Gottingen, under professor Stromeyer, in close application to the kindred sciences of chemistry and mineralogy. He was appointed professor of chemistry in the London University on its foundation in 1828; and from his talents and indefatigable exertions, his moral qualities and amenity of temper, he was admirably calculated for the situation he so ably filled. As a writer he will long be known by his "Elements of Chemistry." Died, 1867.

TURPIN, FRANCIS HENRY, a French historian, was born at Caen, in Normandy, in 1709. He wrote "La France illustre, ou le Plutarque français," 4 vols.; and other works on biography and history. Died, 1799.

TUSSEY, THOMAS, an early georgical poet, was born about 1515, at Rivenhall, in Essex. After having been a chorister at St. Paul's, he was educated at Eton, and at King's college, Cambridge; spent ten years at court under the patronage of lord Paget; and then became a farmer in Suffolk, where he composed a book on husbandry, and dedicated it to his patron. His work is in homely verse, and is entitled, "Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry." Died, about 1580.

TUTCHIN, JOHN, a political writer, distinguished for his boldness and virulence. At the time of Monmouth's rebellion, he published a pamphlet in his favour, for which he was tried, and sentenced by Judge

Jeffries to be whipped through all the principal market towns in the west of England. He petitioned the king that his sentence might be commuted to hanging; and he was at length pardoned. Yet so forgetful was he of the favour he had been shown, that on the death of James II., he wrote an invective against the unfortunate monarch. Died, 1707.

TUTHILL, SIR GEORGE, was a physician of some eminence, whose practice latterly had been chiefly confined to diseases of the brain, though at one time he was a popular lecturer on the practice of physic. At the time of Bonaparte's detention of the English during the short peace of 1801, Dr. Tuthill and his lady were among the number; but after several years' captivity they obtained their liberty, the lady having personally encountered the chief consul and his suite on their return from hunting; and presented a memorial which had been prepared for the occasion. Died, 1838.

TWEDDE, JOHN, a highly accomplished scholar, was born in 1769, at Threepwood, near Hexham; was educated first at Hartforth school, York-shire, next under Dr. Parr, and lastly at Trinity college, Cambridge; gained several prizes at the university, became a student of the Middle Temple; began his travels in 1795, with a view to accomplish himself as a diplomatist; and, after remaining abroad four years, died suddenly at Athens. It was known that he had amassed large materials with a view to publication; but the manuscripts of the observations which he made in his journey, were unfortunately lost.

TWISS, RICHARD, an English traveller, born in 1747, was a man of fortune, and spent several years in visiting various parts of the continent. He died in 1821. Among his works are, "Travels through Spain and Portugal;" "A Tour in Ireland;" "A Trip to Paris in 1792;" "Anecdotes of Chess;" and "Miscellanies."

TWYSDEN, SIR ROGER, the second baronet of the family, was born at East Peckham, in Kent, in 1597. His father, Sir William, accompanied James I. to England, and was created a baronet. Sir Roger, who was an excellent antiquary, suffered severely from his attachment to the royal cause. Besides contributing to Philip's Survey of Kent, and the publication of the "Decem Scriptores," he was the author of "The Historical Defence of the Church of England." Died, 1672.

TYCHEN, OLAF GERHARD, a celebrated Danish scholar, was born in 1734, at Tondern; and became professor of Oriental languages, and librarian, at Rostock. He wrote several able works on the Hebrew, Arabic, and Syriac languages. Died, 1815.

TYRREL, JAMES, an historian and political writer, was born in 1642, in London; was educated at Queen's college, Oxford; studied in the Inner Temple, and was called to the bar, but never practised professionally. He is the author of a "General History of England;" and other works. Died, 1718.

TYRTÆUS, an ancient Greek poet, celebrated for his martial strains, who flourished about B.C. 640, is said to have been a slave of Miletus, and to have settled at Athens. He was lame, and blind of one eye. In the war between the Lacedæmonians and Meseuians, the Spartans applied to the Athenians for a general; and the latter, it is supposed, in derision, sent them Tyrtæus. The bard, however, so inspired the Spartans by his warlike songs, that they reduced the Meseuians to subjection. He was accordingly treated with great respect, and granted the rights of citizenship; and the martial airs of Tyrtæus were constantly played in the Lacedæmonian army, as long as that republic existed.

TYRWITT, THOMAS, an eminent scholar and critic, was born at Westminster, in 1730, and was educated at Eton, and at Queen's college, Oxford. In 1756 he was under secretary in the war department; and, in 1762, clerk to the House of Commons; but he resigned his situation in 1768, in order to devote himself to literature. He was a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies, and one of the curators of the British Museum. Among his works are, editions of "Chaucer's Canterbury Tales," 8 vols.; and "Rowley's Poems," the latter of which he proves to be the composition of Chatterton; also "Disertatio de Hæro;" "Notes on Euripides;" &c. Died, 1768.

TYSON, EDWARD, a physician, was born at Bristol, in 1649; and educated at Magdalen-hall, Oxford. He became a member of the College of Physicians, and the Royal Society; and he was physician to Bedlam and Bridewell hospitals. Dr. Tyson was a very skilful anatomist and an able writer: he published "The Anatomy of a Porpoise;" "The Anatomy of a Pigmy, compared with that of a Monkey, an Ape, and a Man, with a philosophical discourse, concerning the Pigmies of the Ancients," and several clever essays in the Philosophical Transactions. Died, 1708.

TYSENS, PETER, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1635. In historical composition, it is said, he was very little inferior to Rubens. Died, 1692.—There were also two other painters of some note, of the name of Tysons, but less eminent than the preceding.

TYTLER, WILLIAM, an historical and miscellaneous writer, was born at Edinburgh, in 1711; was educated at the university of his native city; followed the profession of a solicitor; and died in 1792. His principal work is, "An Historical and Critical Inquiry into the Evidence produced against Mary, Queen of Scots." He was also a contributor to the Transactions of the Edinburgh Antiquarian Society, of which he was one of the vice-presidents.

TYTLER, ALEXANDER FRASER, lord Woodhouselee, son of the preceding, was born in 1747, at Edinburgh, in which city he was educated. After having been professor of universal history at the university, and deputy judge advocate for Scotland, he was raised to the bench of the Court of Session, and took his seat as lord Woodhouselee, in 1802; and on the elevation of lord Hope to the president's chair in 1811, he was appointed a commissioner of justice. Among his works are, "Decisions of the Court of Session;" a treatise on "Marital Law;" "Outline of a course of Lectures on Universal History;" "Elements of General History;" "An Essay on the Principles of Translation;" "An Historical and Critical Essay on the Life of Petrarch;" and "Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Lord Kames." Died, 1813.

TYTLER, JAMES, an eccentric, laborious, and able writer, was born at Brechin, in Scotland, in 1747. His first work, entitled "Essays on the most important Subjects of Natural and Revealed Religion," was printed by the author himself, without any manuscript or notice whatever, but just as the ideas arose in his mind. His other principal works are, "A System of Geography;" a "Geographical, Historical, and Commercial Grammar;" a "History of Edinburgh;" and a poetical translation of Virgil's Eclogues. He also edited several periodical works, viz. "The Historical Register," "The Gentleman and Lady's Magazine," "The Weekly Review," &c., and contributed largely to the Encyclopædia Britannica. He died in America in 1803.

TZETZES, JOHN, a Greek poet and critic of the 12th century. He wrote "Allegories on Homer;" "Miscellaneous Histories," &c. and was celebrated in his time for his prodigious memory and great acquirements.

U.

UBALDINI, PIERLUIGI, a celebrated illuminator on vellum, in the 16th century, was a native of Florence, and came to England in the reign of Elizabeth. His "Vita di Carlo Magno," which appeared in 1580, is said to be the first Italian book printed in this country. He also wrote a "Description of Scotland," and "The Lives of Illustrious Females in England and Scotland."

UDAL, NICHOLAS, born in Hampshire, in 1266; became head master of Westminster school; and was notorious as a dis-plinarian. He wrote several school books, and some comedies in Latin; but none of the latter are extant.

UDAL, JOHN, a learned Orientalist; author of "A Key to the Holy Tongue," being the first Hebrew grammar printed in England. He was a rigid puritan, suffered much persecution, and died in prison in 1592.—His son, EPHRAIM, who held the living of St. Augustine's, Watling-street, till deprived of it at the rebellion, was a zealous episcopalian; and was alike remarkable for UDINA, GIOVANNI DA, an Italian painter, born in 1469, was a pupil of Giorgione and Raphael; and excelled in the grotesque. Died, 1562.

UFFENBACH, ZACHARY CONRAD, born at Frankfurt, in 1663; author of an "Historical Account of Germany in the Middle Ages," &c. He was an eminent book-collector, and left at his death one of the first private libraries in Europe. Died, 1731.

ULKENS, JAMES ALBERT, a Dutch naturalist, was born near Groningen, in 1772. Among his numerous works are, an "Elementary Treatise on Physics;" a "Discourse on the Perfections of the Creator could red in the Creature," 4 vols.; and a "Manual of Technology." In 1815 he was appointed to the chair of rural economy at Groningen; and died in 1838.

ULLOA, DON ANTONIA, a Spanish mathematician, and commander of the order of St. Jago, was born at Seville, in 1716, and died in 1796. He was one of the mathematicians employed in measuring a degree of the meridian in Peru, in 1745; and remained there ten years. On his return, he was taken prisoner by the English, but was soon released. He published his "Travels," and a physico-historical work on South America. Died, 1796.

ULLOA Y PEREIRA, LOUIS DE, a Spanish poet, who gained great reputation by his sonnets in the reign of Philip IV. Died, 1690.

ULPHILAS, or WULFILAS, a Gothic bishop, of the fourth century. He was deputed by the Goths, in 377, to obtain leave from the emperor Valens to settle in one of the Roman provinces. He translated the Evangelists, and some other parts of Scripture, into the Gothic language.

ULPIAN, DOMITIUS, an eminent Roman civilian, the tutor, friend, and minister of the emperor Alexander Severus, who made him his secretary, and afterwards prætorian prefect. Having offended the soldiery by his reforms, they broke out into open mutiny, and Ulpian was murdered by them, in 218. Ulpian has obtained the praise of all the heathens; but the Christians accuse him of a determined enmity to them, which he carried so far as to collect all the edicts and decrees of the preceding sovereigns against them.

ULUGH-BEIGH, or OLEG BEK, a Tartar prince of the 15th century, celebrated for his astronomical knowledge, was grandson of Tamerlane, and was born in 1394. His real name was Mohammed Tarragai. He formed a seminary, chiefly for the study of mathematics and astronomy, constructed an observatory at Samarcand, and was a patron of learning. After a reign of forty years, he was put to death, in 1449, by one of his sons who had rebelled against him. Science is indebted to him for a series of observations on the fixed stars; and his works on Chronology, Geography, and Astronomy were published in Latin by Greaves.

UNDERWOOD, T. R., an artist and geologist. He was the author of a "Narrative of Memorable Events in Paris during the Capitulation in 1814," and "Anecdotes of Buonaparte's Journey to, and Return from Elba." Died, near Paris, 1828.

UNZER, JOHN AUGUSTUS, a German physician, and an able writer on medicine and physiology, was born at Halle, in 1727. After engaging in practice at his native place and at Hamburg, he established himself at Altona, and arrived at the height of professional reputation. Among his works are, "A new Doctrine concerning the Movements of the Soul and of the Imagination;" "Thoughts on Sleep and Dreams;" "On the Sensitive Faculties of Animated Bodies;" a "Manual of Medicine;" and "The Physiology of Animal Nature." Died, 1788.

UPTON, JAMES, a learned divine, was born in Cheshire, in 1670, and died in 1748. He published an excellent edition of "Achan's School-master," with notes; and "Aristotle's Art of Poetry" and "Dionysius of Halicarnassus on Rhetoric."—His son, JAMES, was born at Taunton, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford; after which he became rector of Rislington, in Gloucestershire, and prebendary of Rochester. His works are, an edition of "Epictetus;" another of "Spenser's Faerie Queene;" and "Observations on Shakespeare." Died, 1760.

URFE, HONORE D', a French romance writer, was born in 1657, at Marcellies. He distinguished himself as a soldier during the wars of the league, and as a negotiator at Turin and Venice. He is the author of the romance of Astrea, which was once exceedingly popular in France. Died, 1696.

URBAN VIII. a celebrated pope, whose family name was MAFFEI BARBERINI, was born at Florence, in 1568. He studied the law at Pisa; after which he entered into orders, and, in 1600, attained the rank of cardinal. In 1623, he was elected to the papal chair; and proved himself a zealous advocate for the interests, spiritual and temporal, of the Roman church. He was also a patron of learning, and founded the college "De Propaganda Fide." No less than seventy-four cardinals were created by this pontiff. Died, 1644.

URBAN, FERDINAND DE ST., an eminent artist, born at Nancy, in 1654. He became first architect and director of medals to pope Innocent XI., for whom and for his two immediate successors, he executed a great number of moulds or matrices of exquisite beauty. Died, 1738.

URQUHART, SIR THOMAS, of Cromarty, in Scotland, was a philologist and mathematician. He was a cavalier officer among the followers of Charles II., and was present at the battle of Worcester; relative to which he published a piece, entitled "The Discovery of a most rare Jewel, found in the Kennel of Worcester Streets," &c. He was also the author of a work on Trigonometry; but the performance which he regarded as his most admirable invention, was called "Logopandecticon, or an introduction to the Universal Language."

tile, in 1768. He passed some of his early years in England; and is supposed to have there acquired those liberal notions in politics, which he afterwards displayed. During the ministry of Godoy, he became secretary of state for foreign affairs; but having at length offended the royal favourite, he was disgraced in 1800, and for several years closely confined in the citadel of Pampeluna. On the accession of Ferdinand in 1808, he was set at liberty; followed the royal family to Bayonne; was afterwards minister of state; and died in 1817.

URSINUS, ZACHARY, one of the early reformers, was born at Breslaw, in Silesia, in 1534. He studied at Wittenberg, where he acquired the friendship of Melancthon, whom he accompanied to the conference at Worms. He afterwards became master of the school at Breslaw; then went to Heidelberg, where he obtained a professorship; and died, professor of divinity, at Newstadt, in 1577.—There were several other divines of the name of Ursinus; among whom may be mentioned JOHN HENRY, author of the "Rise and Progress of the Churches of Germany," &c., who died at Ratisbon, in 1657.—His son, GEORGE HENRY, was eminent as a philologist, and published some able works on etymology, &c. Died, 1707.

URSUS, NICHOLAS RAYMARUS, a Danish mathematician, who died in 1600. He invented an astronomical system so like that of Tycho Brahe as to bring him into a dispute with that astronomer respecting the right of discovery.

USHER, JAMES, a celebrated prelate and historian, was born at Dublin, in 1580; was educated at Trinity college; and took orders in 1601. Soon after, he visited England to purchase books and MSS. for Trinity college library; and during his stay in London, Oxford, and Cambridge, he became acquainted with Sir T. Bodley, Sir Robert Cotton, Camden, Selden, and other learned men. In 1620, he was made bishop of Meath; and in 1624, was raised to the archbishopric of Armagh. The rebellion drove him from his see, and deprived him of every thing but his library and his liberty. To the cause of Charles I. he was warmly attached; and frequently preached before that monarch, at Oxford. He died in 1656, at Ryegate, in Surrey. Archbishop Usher is the author of many learned works; among which may be mentioned, "De Ecclesiis Christianarum Successione et Statu;" "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates;" "Annals of the Old and New Testament;" and "Chronologia Sacra."

USTARIZ, JEROME, a Spanish writer on political economy, who died about the middle of the 18th century. His "Theory and Practice of Commerce and Navigation," has been translated both into the French and English languages; and is regarded as a valuable work.

USTERI, LEONARD, a Swiss writer on education, was born at Zurich, in 1741. The reform in the schools and gymnasia, effected in 1773, were chiefly owing to his exertions. He was keeper of the public library, and member of the philosophical society at Zurich. Died, 1789.

UTENHOVIUS, CHARLES, a polemical and political divine, born at Ghent, about 1536. On the death of queen Mary, he visited England, and wrote in defence of the reformed religion, and of Elizabeth's right to the throne, which raised him high in her favour. He died at Cologne, towards the end of the 16th century.

UVEDALE, ROBERT, LL.D., an eminent botanist, was born in London, in 1642; and was educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge. He was a good classical scholar; and became master of the foundation school, at Enfield, where his botanical garden was cultivated with great care, and contained a number of choice exotics. Dr. Uvedale assisted Dryden and his associates in translating Pindar's Lives. The date of his death is not known.

UWINS, DAVID, MD. an eminent physician, and medical writer, was born in London, in 1780. After going through a regular course of hospital instruction, and completing his studies at Edinburgh, he commenced practice as assistant-physician to the Finsbury dispensary; subsequently settled at Aylesbury; and, returning to London shortly after he had married, was elected physician to the City Dispensary in 1815. He particularly directed his attention to mental diseases; and, an essay on Insanity and Madhouses, in the Quarterly Review for July 1816, established his power as a medical writer. He also wrote "Reports" in the Monthly Magazine, and afterwards became editor of the Medical Repository. In 1828 he was appointed physician to the lunatic asylum at Peckham, and published a work on Insanity, which was eagerly read. But his last production, a pamphlet on Homoeopathy, is supposed to have injured his professional reputation. He died in September, 1837.

UZ, JOHN PETER, an eminent lyric poet of Germany, who held the office of assessor of the tribunal at Nuremberg. Died, 1796.

VACCA, PLAMPIO, an Italian sculptor of the 16th century, who was employed by Sixtus V. in restoring and beautifying the public edifices of Rome, of the antiquities of which city he wrote a memoir.

VADE, JOHN JOSEPH, a French farce and song writer, was a native of Ham, in Picardy. He was the first who introduced, on the French stage, the coarse but expressive language of the Parisian mob; and his comic operas, &c., exhibit all the low humour and vivacity of that class, whose manners he delighted in representing. He died, aged 37, in 1757.

TRUE PHILOSOPHY, ELEVATING HERSELF ABOVE EVERY DIFFICULTY, RISES LIKE THE PHOENIX FROM HER OWN ASHES.

VAHL, MARTIN, a Norwegian botanist, was born at Bergen, in 1749; studied natural history and botany under Linnæus; and travelled over various parts of Europe and Africa. On his return, he became professor of botany, and inspector of the botanical garden at Copenhagen; and died in 1804. He wrote "Symbole Botanice;" "Eloge Americain;" "Enumeratio Plantarum;" and was the continuator of the "Flora Danica."

VAILLANT, JOHN FOI, a celebrated French medalist, was born at Beauvais, in 1632. He first studied medicine, and took the degree of doctor of physic, but quitted that profession for the study of antiquities, and was employed by Colbert to travel in quest of medals for the royal cabinet. In 1674, he sailed from Marseilles for Italy, but was taken by the Algerines, and kept in slavery about five months, when he obtained his liberty, and twenty medals which had been taken from him. On his voyage home, the ship was chased by another corsair, and the dread of being again captured, induced him to swallow his medals, which fortunately did him no serious injury. He afterwards travelled into Persia and Egypt, in quest of medals and antiquities; greatly augmented the treasures of the king's cabinet; and published some excellent works on numismatology. Died, 1706.—JOHN FRANCIS FOI, his son, followed the pursuits of his father. Died, 1706.

VAILLANT, SEBASTIAN, who distinguished himself as an able botanist, was born in 1680, at Vigny, near Pontoise. He was first a musician, next a surgeon, and afterwards secretary to Fagon, physician to Louis XIV. By the interest of his patron he became director of the royal gardens, where he was made professor and demonstrator of plants. His great work is the "Botanica Parleuse." Died, 1722.

VAILLANT, FRANCIS LE, a celebrated traveller, born at Parmaribo, in Dutch Guiana, in 1733. Having been at Paris, in 1777, and examined the cabinets of natural history there, he formed the design of personally visiting the countries whence the curiosities he saw, were procured. Africa became the first object of his attention; and sailing to the Cape of Good Hope, he made repeated excursions into the interior. On his return, he occupied himself in preparing for the press the result of his observations; but the revolution soon after breaking out, he became involved in its troubles, and in all probability would have suffered by the guillotine, had not the death of Robespierre been the cause of his liberation. He afterwards retired to his estate at La Noue, near Szazanne; and published his "Travels into the Interior of Africa," 5 vols., "The Natural History of the Birds of Africa," and other similar works. Died, 1824.

VALAZE, CHAS. ELEANORE DU FAICHE DE, a native of Alençon, born in 1751; one of the Girondists in the French National Convention, who, opposing the sanguinary violence of Robespierre, were suppressed and destroyed by him. When arrested on the 31st of May, 1793, with his colleagues, he was offered means of escape, but refused. At the moment that Herman, the president of the revolutionary tribunal pronounced sentence of death on him and his friends, on the charge of federalism, he poniarded himself. His body, at the instance of the execrable Fouquier Tinville, was carried to the scaffold, and beheaded. The Convention granted a pension to his widow and children, on the fall of Robespierre.

VAL CARCEL, DON PIO ANTONIO, count de Lunars; a learned Spanish antiquarian, was born in 1740; and died in 1800. He left some erudite dissertations on the inscriptions of Saguntum, and those of Carthago and Almazarron, in the Moorish kingdom of Murcia.

VALCKENAER, LOUIS CASPAR, an able philologist and critic, was born at Loozwarden, in Friesland, in 1715; and became professor of natural history, Greek, and antiquities at the university of Leyden, where he died in 1785. His works are numerous and erudite.—His son, JOHN VALCKENAER, who was professor of jurisprudence at Franeker, having joined the party against the house of Orange, was obliged to take refuge in France; but returned to Holland at the invasion of that country by the French, in 1793, and took a very active part in politics. He was subsequently employed in diplomatic missions to Prussia, Spain, and Paris. Died, 1828.

VALDES, or VALDESSO, JOHN, a Spanish military officer, who served under Charles V. and was knighted; but he quitted the army, and retired to Naples, where he formed a religious sect, and died in 1540. He wrote "Considerations on a religious Life."

VALDEZ, JUAN MELENDEZ, a Spanish poet, was born at Ribera, in Estremadura. He wrote many pieces of Amæroætic poetry; and filled high offices in the legal administration of his country. Died, 1817.

VALDO, PETER, founder of the sect called the Valdais, or Waldenses, in the 12th century, was born at Vaux, in Dauphiny, and acquired a fortune as a merchant of Lyons. The sudden death of a friend had such an effect on his mind, as to induce him to sell his property, give the produce of it to the poor, and devote the remainder of his life to acts of piety. Like the Quakers, he taught that the laity might conduct the offices of religion, without the intervention of priests; but a heresy so obnoxious to the ecclesiastics soon met with the direst persecution; Valdo and his followers fled to the mountains of Dauphiny and Piedmont; and the Waldenses were everywhere exterminated, except in the three valleys of Piedmont, where a remnant of them still exists.

VALENS, FLAVIUS, a Roman emperor, born in Thracia, about A.D. 238, and admitted to a share in the imperial authority by his brother Valentinian, in 3-4, when he took the government of the East. He perished in a revolt of the Persians and Goths, whom he had previously subdued, A.D. 378.

VALENTIN, MOSA, an eminent painter, was born at Colomiers, in Brle, in 1600. His pieces are highly esteemed. Died, 1633.

VALENTINE, BASIL, an alchemist and chemical author in the sixteenth century. He published "Curus Triumphalis Ammonit," and similar works.

VALENTINIAN I., FLAVIUS, a Roman emperor, the elder brother of the preceding; born in 321, in Pannonia; succeeded Julian in 361; defeated the Alemanni and the Quadi; and died in 375.—VALENTINIAN II., his son, succeeded to the empire with his brother Gratian, in 375; and had Italy as his share. He was dispossessed by Maximus, but was afterwards restored; and died, as is supposed, by strangulation, in 392.—Valentinian III., FLAVIUS PLACIDIUS, emperor of the West, was born in 419, at Ravenna. Having intrigued with the wife of the patrician Maximus, he was assassinated in revenge for the dishonour, in 455.

VALERIAN, PUBLIUS LICINIUS, a Roman, who was proclaimed emperor by his soldiers in Rhodus, in 254. He was defeated and taken prisoner near Edessa, by Sapor, king of Persia, who ordered him to be bayed alive.

VALERIUS MAXIMUS, a Roman historian, who lived in the reign of Tiberius. After having served in Asia, under Sextus Pompey, he devoted his leisure to the composition of his "Dirta et Facta Memorabilia," a collection of anecdotes and observations. On the revival of literature, it was one of the earliest books which issued from the press after the invention of printing.

VALETTE, JOHN PARIBOT DE LA, grand master of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, was born in 1494, and succeeded to the grand-mastership in 1537. He and his knights gallantly repulsed Solymán, the Turkish sultan, in his attempt to take Malta, in 1565; compelling the besiegers to retire with a loss of 30,000 men. Died, 1568.

VALLA, LAURENCE, one of the revivers of literature in the 15th century, was born at Rome, in 1408; became eminent as a professor at several universities, and engaged in many literary controversies with Poggio and others. Of his numerous writings, his treatise "De Elegantis Latini Sermonis" still maintains its reputation. Died, 1457.

VALLANCY, or VALLANCE, a writer on the antiquities of Ireland, was born in 1721. During his residence in Ireland, as an officer in a corps of engineers, he assiduously devoted himself to the study of the language, topography, and antiquities of that country; made a survey of the island, for which he received 1000*l.*; and wrote a "Grammar and Dictionary of the Irish Language"; "Collectanea de Rebus Hibernicis," &c. He attained the rank of a general; was a member of several scientific institutions; and died, aged 90, in 1812.

VALLÉ, PIERRO DELLA, a celebrated traveller of the 17th century, was born at Rome, in 1586, of a noble family. His travels, though not free from credulity, and a love of the marvellous, are highly interesting. He visited Turkey, Egypt, Arabia, Persia, and India, passing upwards of eleven years in these countries, and studying the languages and manners of the inhabitants. At Bagdad he married a beautiful Georgian, who accompanied him on his travels until her death, at Mina, in Carmania, in 1622. Her death so affected him, that he caused her body to be embalmed, and took it about with him, until his return to Rome, where he buried it with great magnificence, and pronounced the funeral oration himself. Died, 1632.

VALLI, EUSEBIO, an eminent Italian physician, born at Pistoia, in 1762. He travelled to Smyrna and Constantinople, in order to make his observations on the plague; and tried the bold experiment on himself, to determine the efficacy of vaccination as a preservative from that dreadful malady. At length he fell a victim to his imprudence; for in September, 1816, having gone to the Havannah, to add to his observations on the influence of the contagion, and caught the disease, of which he died. His works on the subjects he so closely investigated are considered valuable.

VALPERGA DI CALUSO, THOMAS DEB., a Piedmontese mathematician and astronomer, was born at Turin, in 1730. He first served in the navy; but quitted the profession of arms for that of an ecclesiastic, and devoted much of his attention to science. He was member of the grand council and director of the observatory of the university of Turin, a member of the legion of honour, &c. Died, 1815.

VALPY, DR. RICHARD, F.A.S., an eminent classical scholar, was a native of Jersey, and born in 1754. At ten years of age he was sent to the college of Vauognes, in Normandy, where he remained five years; thence to the grammar school at Southampton; and completed his studies at Oxford, having been appointed to one of the scholarships founded in Pembroke college for the natives of Jersey and Guernsey. From Oxford he removed first to Bury St. Edmund's, and afterwards (1781) to Reading, where he had been unanimously elected head-master of the school founded by Henry VII. His unwearied industry in discharging the duties of a public instructor was not confined to the school-room; all the hours he could spare were spent in his study, and numerous elementary works of acknowledged excellence were the result of his praiseworthy exertions. About six years before his death he retired from his scholastic labours, when his youngest son, the Rev. F. Valpy, was elected as his successor. Died, 1835.

VALPY, EDWARD, an eminent scholar, brother of the preceding, was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge; and, after having been assistant several years in the school at Reading, obtained the mastership of the grammar-school at Norwich. He was rector of All Saints, Thwaite, and vicar of St. Mary, Walsham, Norfolk. He published "Elegantie Latine;" and other classical works. Died, 1832.

VANBRUGH, SIR JOHN, a dramatist and architect, descended from a Flemish family resident in England, was born in 1673, and entered into the army. In 1697, his comedy of "The Relapse" was represented; and, in the following year, he produced "The Provoked Wife," and "Æsop," afterwards altered by Garrick. When Betterton and Congreve obtained a patent for erecting a theatre in the Haymarket, Vanbrugh wrote the "Confederacy," the most witty and licentious of his productions. As an archifect, Vanbrugh was selected to build Blenheim house; and that structure, as well as Castle Howard, affords proof of skill and genius. He obtained the office of Ciarencieux king-at-arms; and, in 1714, received the honour of knighthood. He was also appointed comptroller of the board of works and surveyor of Greenwich hospital. Died, 1726.

VANCE, GEORGE, an eminent surgeon, who during the latter period of his life resided in Sackville-street, Piccadilly, was distinguished for his abilities in difficult cases, particularly in diseases of the stomach and liver. He acquired great reputation for his skill early in life, and was one of the resident surgeons of Haslar Hospital, near Gosport, for seventeen years. His death occurred in consequence of an accident which happened to him while in attendance on one of his patients, a Mr. Broadley, residing in Lower Grosvenor-street. Mr. Vance had on a previous visit to this gentleman found him in a state of such excitement as to recommend his being placed under the charge of a competent attendant, which had accordingly been done; but at his next visit, while in the act of walking up the stairs, Mr. Broadley suddenly rushed from his room, and coming in violent collision with him, he was precipitated to the bottom. He survived this melancholy event only six days: "thus terminating," as his friend Dr. Willis truly observed, "a life of ardent devotion to the duties of his profession, and of exemplary conduct in all the social relations of life." March 27, 1837.

VANCOUVER, GEORGE, a circumnavigator, and captain in the British navy. He served as a midshipman under captain Cook; and a voyage of discovery, to ascertain the existence of any navigable communication between the North Pacific and North Atlantic oceans, being determined on, he was appointed to command it. "Vancouver's Voyage" was afterwards published by him. Died, 1798.

VANDALE, ANTHONY, a Dutch theologian, was born in 1638. Among his various works are, dissertations "On the Progress and Origin of Idolatry;" "On True and False Prophecy," &c. Died, 1708.

VANDAMME, DOMINIQUE, a French general, born in 1771. He entered the military service very young, and was made general of division in 1799, after distinguishing himself in the revolutionary campaigns of the Rhine. He served in most of Napoleon's campaigns with Austria in 1806-7-9; but was not in the Russian campaign of 1812, having been disgraced in consequence of some dispute with Jerome Buonaparte. But he had the command of the 3rd division in 1813. With that corps he fell into an ambuscade at Kulm; his forces were nearly all cut to pieces, and himself, being made prisoner, was sent to Kamen, near Siberia. He was restored to freedom by the peace of 1814; but ordered to quit Paris in twenty-four hours. He joined Buonaparte during the Hundred Days, and served in Grouchy's division at the time of the battle of Waterloo. He made a skilful retreat, and offered the provisional government to defend Paris with the 80,000 troops he had saved and collected; but was compelled by the negotiations to retire behind the Loire. In 1816 he was banished by ordinance to Ghent, and afterwards fixed his residence in the United States. By a subsequent ordinance, he was permitted to re enter France, and put on half-pay in 1834. He died in 1830.

VANDERVELDE, WILLIAM, called the Old, a celebrated painter, was born at Leyden, in 1610. He excelled in marine subjects, and with his son, whose pursuits in art were similar to his own, he came to London, and received a pension from Charles II. At the great naval fight between the duke of York and the Dutch admiral Opdam, Vandervelde sailed between the hostile fleets in a light ship to mark their positions and observe their operations; and in this manner he is said to have been also a spectator of the memorable three days' engagement between Monk and De Ruyter. Died, 1693. His son, known as Young Vandervelde, died in 1707.

VANDYCK, SIR ANTHONY, the most eminent of all portrait painters, was born at Antwerp, in 1606. He received his first instructions from Van Balen, but afterwards became the favourite pupil of Rubens, who advised him to apply wholly to portrait painting, and to visit Italy. Accordingly, he set out for that country, where he studied the colouring of Titian with such success as to excel Rubens in his tint, and almost to become the rival of the great master whose art he imitated. In the early part of the reign of Charles I. he came to England, obtained a pension, and was knighted. He lived in a splendid style, kept the first company, and was himself a liberal patron of the arts.

VAN DYK, HARRY STOR, a poetical and miscellaneous writer, was born in London, in 1798. He was the author of "Theatrical Portraits;" "The Gondola," a series of tales; and "Songs," set to music. He also contributed to Dr. Browning's "Batavian Anthology." Died, 1834.

VANE, SIR HENRY, the son of a baronet who was secretary of state, and treasurer of the royal household, was born in 1612; received his education at Westminster school, and at Magdalen college, Oxford; after which he resided for some time at Geneva, and returned a republican and puritan. He then emigrated to America, and was elected governor of Massachusetts; but becoming involved in religious disputes, he returned to England, and was appointed joint treasurer of the navy. In 1640 he was elected member of parliament for Hull, and took an active part against the royalists. He was the principal mover of the solemn league and covenant, and also of the self-denying ordinance; but he did not sit on the king's trial; and he resisted Cromwell to such a degree, that the usurper sent him to Carisbrooke castle. He afterwards strenuously exerted himself to establish a republican government, until the restoration put an end to all further contest. On this event he had considered himself in no danger; but he was arrested and committed to the Tower. Although accused only for transactions that occurred after the king's death, he was found guilty, and beheaded on Tower hill, in 1662. Sir Henry Vane, like most religious enthusiasts who interfere in politics, was a very equivocal character, and employed great craft and dissimulation, whatever his real intentions might have been.

VANINI, LUCILIO, a Neapolitan, whose writings were deemed atheistical, was born in 1588. After travelling through Germany, Holland, and England, he went to Toulouse, where he was arrested, and condemned by the parliament to be burnt alive. He wrote "Amphitheatrum Æternæ Providentiæ;" and "De Admirandis Naturæ Arcanibus;" for which latter work he suffered in 1619.

VANLOO, JOHN BAPTIST, an eminent painter, was born at Aix, in Provence, in 1661. He became painter to the king of Sardinia, and realized a good fortune, which he lost in the Mississippi scheme. He then came to England, and was the fashionable portrait painter of the day. Died, 1746.—His brother, CHARLES ANDREW, whose performances are to be found in the churches of Paris, was also a celebrated painter. Died, 1763.

VAN MANDER, CHARLES, a painter, poet, and biographer, was born in Holland, in 1594; wrote several dramatic productions, and "Lives of the Painters;" and excelled both in historical and landscape painting. Died, 1648.

VAN MILDERT, Dr. WILLIAM, bishop of Durham, a learned and pious prelate, was born in London, in 1766; received his education at Merchant-tailors' school, and at Queen's college, Oxford; and entered into holy orders in 1788, as curate of Sherbourn and Lewknor, Oxfordshire. He was afterwards curate of Witham, in Essex, and in 1796 obtained the rectory of St. Mary-le-Bow, London. His abilities as a preacher soon attracted public notice, and the attention of learned men was particularly called to his "Boyle's Lectures," which, in tracing the rise and progress of infidelity, and in refuting its principles, display an extent of reading and a force of judgment never excelled. He was soon after presented with the vicarage of Farningham, Kent, by archbishop Sutton; and he subsequently became preacher of Lincoln's Inn, and regius professor of divinity at Oxford. In 1819 he was made bishop of Llandaff, and dean of St. Paul's in the following year. He then resigned his station at Oxford, which he had filled in the most efficient manner; and on the death of Dr. Shute Barrington, in 1826, he was raised to the see of Durham. As a theological writer, Dr. Van Mildert stands in the first class; his "Life of Waterland" is a luminous and comprehensive performance, filling up a chasm in our ecclesiastical history; and many of his sermons are perfect specimens of pulpit eloquence and logical reasoning. While defending in his place in parliament those institutions by which the church and state are connected, he was invariably listened to with profound attention; but the grand excellences of his character were manifested in his unbounded charity, and in his deep, habitual, and pervading sense of religion. He died, Feb. 21, 1836; and his remains were deposited in the nave of the cathedral church of Durham—the first Protestant bishop ever there interred.

VANNI, CARLOS, a Neapolitan, born in 1778, who, apomtatizing from the liberal principles of the junta of which he was a member, sold himself to their opponents, and became a spy of the ultra royalists in 1775. In this capacity he betrayed the sons of some distinguished families to the scaffold, under pretence of holding a lodge of political freemasons, at a place where he seduced and betrayed them. This wretch destroyed himself at Sorrento, in 1790, leaving a paper expressive of his remorse.

VANSOMER, PAUL, a portrait painter, was born at Antwerp, in 1576; and died in 1621. He resided in England many years, and was greatly encouraged by the nobility and gentry.

VAN SWIETEN, GERARD, an eminent physician, was born at Leyden, in 1700. He went to reside at Vienna, and there laid the foundation of a medical school, established chemical lectures in one of the hospitals, enlarged the botanical garden, and prevailed upon the government to rebuild the university. His principal work is a "Commentary on the Aphorisms of Boerhaave," 5 vols. 4to. Died, 1772.

VARGAS, LOUIS DE, a Spanish painter, born at Seville, in 1502. Some of his performances, particularly his portraits, are allowed to possess very great merit. Died, 1648.

VARIGNON, PIERRE, an eminent French mathematician, was born at Caen, in Normandy, in 1654. He became geometriician in the academy, and professor in the college of Mazarin, where he died in 1722. Among his works are, "Projet d'une nouvelle Mécanique;" "Des nouvelles Conjectures sur la Pesanteur;" "Nouvelle Mécanique en Statique," 2 vols.; "Un Traité du Mouvement et de la Mesure des Eaux Courantes;" "De Cahiers de Mathématiques," &c.

VARIUS, a Latin poet, who was the intimate friend of Virgil and Horace. Some of his fragments are in the Corpus Poetarum.

VARRO, MARCUS TERENCEUS, a Roman writer, was born B.C. 116, and died B.C. 29. He dedicated to Cicero a treatise on the Latin language, and he wrote another, "De Re Rustica," which are extant, with some fragments of his Menippean Satires.

VASARI, GEORGE, an Italian painter and architect, was born at Arezzo, in 1514; and died at Florence, in 1576. He wrote the "Lives of Celebrated Painters, Sculptors, and Architects."

VATTEL, EMER DE, a celebrated writer on jurisprudence, was born at Neuchâtel, in 1714. His principal work is a "Treatise on the Law of Nations, or the Principles of Natural Law applied to the Conduct of States and Sovereigns," 2 vols. 4to. This work was particularly admired, from the predilection of the author for English authorities, while several of the maxims of Puffendorf and Grotius are ably refuted. Died, 1767.

VAUBAN, SEBASTIAN LE PRESTRE, seigneur de, a marshal of France, and the most celebrated engineer that country has produced, was born in 1633. He went into the army at an early age, and rose to the highest honours of his profession. In 1668 he was appointed governor of Lisle; ten years afterwards, commissioner-general of fortifications; and, in 1703, a marshal. He carried the art of fortifying, attacking, and defending towns, to a degree of perfection unknown before his time. He fortified above three hundred citadels, erected thirty-three new ones, had the management of fifty-three sieges, and was present in one hundred and forty battles. His works have a high character; but some have been published with his name, the genuineness of which are doubted. Died, 1731.

VAUBLANC-VIENNOT, VINCENT MARIE, count de, was born in 1736. In 1791 he was appointed deputy to the legislative assembly, where he became a distinguished advocate of the royal cause. The powers assumed by the popular clubs were arranged by him, and he obtained a decree of accusation against Marat. He was not elected a member of the convention, and, though proscribed, he had the good fortune to escape the guillotine. In 1805 he was raised to the dignity of count, and commandant of the legion of honour, and was appointed prefect of the Moselle. On the restoration, he was named minister of the interior, and displayed extraordinary talents and activity.

VAUGELAS, CLAUDE FAYRE DE, an elegant French writer, was born at Chambery, in 1685, and held a situation in the household of the duke of Orleans. His character as a philologist was so high, that cardinal Richelieu, in his favourite design of forming a complete dictionary of the French tongue, thought it advisable to put the whole under his superintendence. He was so fastidious in regard to style, as to spend thirty years in a translation of Quintus Curtius. His principal work is entitled "Remarques sur la Langue Française."

VAUGHAN, HENRY, a poet, born in 1631, at Newion, in Brecknockshire. He adopted the appellation of the Silurist; wrote a variety of poems, chiefly devotional; and died in 1696.—His brother, THOMAS VAUGHAN, was an alchemist, on which occult subject he wrote some extravagant books, under the name of Eugenius Philalethes. Died, 1666.

VAUGHAN, WILLIAM, an ingenious Welsh poet, was born in Carmarthenshire, in 1577; and was the author of a variety of miscellaneous poems, the principal of which are, "De Sphærarum Ordine;" "The Golden Grove moralized;" "The Golden Fleece," &c. Died, 1640.

VAUGHAN, SIR JOHN, a celebrated lawyer, was born in Cardiganshire, in 1608. From Christchurch college, Oxford, he removed to the Inner Temple, where he contracted an intimacy withelden, who made him one of his executors. During the civil war he lived in retirement, but in 1666, he was made chief-justice of the Common Pleas. Died, 1671.

VAUX. The name of a noble English family, originally of French extraction.—NICHOLAS, the first lord VAUX, was a gallant officer, and ranked deservedly high in the favour of Henry VIII., and was present with him and the French monarch in the "field of the cloth of gold." Died, 1539.—His son, THOMAS, inherited his father's valour, and was brides a poet. He attended Henry VIII. to Calais and Boulogne, was made governor of Jersey; and died in 1522.

VEGA, LOPEZ DE LA, or LOPE FELIX DE VEGA CAMPIO, a celebrated Spanish poet, was born at Madrid, in 1562. After studying at Alcalá, he entered into the service of the duke of Alva, at whose instance he wrote the heroic pastoral of "Arcadia." Soon after this he married; but on the loss of his wife, he embarked in the Armada, prepared for the invasion of England. In this voyage, he wrote a poem, called "Hermosura de Angelica," to which, when published, he added the "Dragonetes," an invective against Drake and queen Elizabeth. In 1590, Lope married a second time, and again became a widower, on which he entered into the order of St. Francis. He still, however, cultivated poetry, and scarcely a week passed without seeing a drama from his prolific muse. Honour and wealth flowed in upon him; and he was absolutely idolized by the whole nation. At his death, which happened in 1635, the highest honours were paid to his remains; and all the poets of the age vied in encomiastic tributes to his memory.

VELASQUEZ, DIEGO VELASQUEZ DE SILVA, an eminent Spanish painter, was born at Seville, in 1599. His earliest subjects were taverns, conversations, and entertainments; but he afterwards made Caravaggio his model. By the recommendation of Rubens, he went to Italy, and while there, so greatly improved himself in the grand essentials of the art, that on his return, he was placed at the head of his profession. Died, 1660.

VENDOME, LOUIS JOSEPH, duke of, a celebrated French general, great grandson to Henry IV. He was born in 1664; served in the wars of Louis XIV. in Holland; took Barcelona in 1697; was very successful against the Imperialists in Italy; contributed greatly to the establishment of Philip II. on the Spanish throne, by the victory of Villaviciosa, in 1710; and was admitted to the honours of a prince of the blood-royal. Died, 1712.

VENN, HENRY, an English divine of Calvinistic principles, was born at Barrow, in Surrey, in 1725; and died at Clapham, in 1796. He was the author of "The Complete Duty of Man;" "Mistakes in Religion exposed," and "Sermons."

VENERONI, JOHN, a grammarian of the 18th century, whose real name was Vigneron, which he Italianized, in order to pass for a native of Florence, though he was born at Verdun. He taught Italian, with reputation, at Paris, where he published a grammar, and dictionary of that language.

VENIUS, or VAN VEEN, OTTO, a Dutch painter, was born at Leyden, in 1556. He studied under Zuccheri; and was the first who explained to the Flemish artists the principles of light and shadow, which his pupil, Rubens, afterwards carried to perfection. Died, 1633.

cent French botanist, born at Limoges, in 1737. He became chief librarian of the Pantheon, and a member of the Institute. In 1799, he published "Tableau du Règne Végétal," 4 vols., and other works on the science. Died, 1808.

VENTIMIGLIA, GIUSEPPE, prince of Belmont, born in 1761, a Sicilian liberal nobleman, of great taste and munificence, and the great supporter of the Sicilian constitution established under English auspices in 1812. Died, 1814.

VERE, EDWARD, earl of Oxford, a courtier poet in Elizabeth's time, was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. In 1568 he held the office of lord high chamberlain, and as such sat upon the trial of Mary queen of Scots; he had also a command in the fleet serving against the Spanish armada. There is a specimen in Percy's Reliques of Antient Poetry; and another in England's Parnassus.

VERE, SIR FRANCIS, a renowned English general in the reign of queen Elizabeth, was born in 1554. He fought with great gallantry on many occasions, in various parts of the continent; but we can only find room for the mention of his last great exploit. He defended Ostend for the Dutch with 1700 men against the Spanish army of 12,000, commanded by Albert, archduke of Austria, whom he obliged to raise the siege in March, 1602, after having been eight months before the place. Died, 1604.

VERE, SIR HORACE, baron of Tilbury, younger brother of the preceding, was born in 1565. He served with his brother in the Netherlands, and had a considerable share in the victory near Newport, and in the defence of Ostend. In the reign of James I. he commanded the forces sent to the assistance of the elector Palatine; on which occasion he effected a memorable retreat from Spilola, the Spanish general. He was the first person raised to the peerage by Charles I. Died, 1635.

VEREL-T, SIMON, an eminent Flemish painter, who excelled in flowers and fruits. He visited England; and died in 1710.

VERGIL, POLYDORUS, an eminent historical writer in the 16th century, was born at Urbino, in Italy. He was an ecclesiastic, and was the last person sent by the popes in this country to collect the tribute called Peter's pence. At the request of Henry VIII. he wrote a "History of England," which, considered as the production of a fore guer, is highly creditable to him. He was also the author of "De Rerum Inventoribus," &c. Died, 1555.

VERGNAUD, P. V., born in 1758; one of the chiefs of the Girondist party in the French revolution, remarkable for the brilliant energy of his oratory; who, with Gemonne and Gudet, opposed the sanguinary measures of Robespierre; and being beaten in the struggle with him, were accused before the revolutionary tribunal, and sent to the guillotine. Vergnaud, like many of his colleagues, refused to escape; he had prepared a subtle poison for himself; but as there was not enough for all his fellow victims, he generously resolved to suffer with them.

VERHEYEN, PETER, an eminent Dutch physician and anatomist; author of "Corporis Humani Anatomia." Born, 1648; died, 1710.

VERNES, JACOB, a Genevese divine, born in 1728. He was the author of "Lectures sur le Christianisme de J. J. Rousseau;" "Choix Littéraire," 24 vols.; "Conférence Philosophique," 2 vols.; and "Sermons," 2 vols. Died, 1791.

VERNET, CLAUDE JOSEPH, a French painter, was born at Avignon, in 1712. He was highly esteemed, and became the first marine painter in Europe. Died, 1780.

VERNON, EDWARD, a brave English admiral, born in Westminster, in 1684, was a son of the secretary of state to William III. After a variety of service under different commanders, he was made vice-admiral of the blue in 1730, and sent with a squadron to Spanish America, where he took Porto Bello, and destroyed the fortifications; but in 1741 he proved unsuccessful in an attack upon Carthagea. Died, 1757.

VERSCHURING, HENRY, a celebrated Dutch painter, born at Gorcum, in 1627. He principally excelled in battle pieces; and, in order to ensure accuracy, he actually made a campaign in 1672. Accidentally drowned, 1690.

VERSTEGAN, RICHARD, an ingenious writer on English antiquities, was born in London, of Dutch parents, and resided at Antwerp. He was the author of "Restitution of decayed Intelligence concerning the Antiquities of the noble and renowned English Nation;" "Antiquitates Belgicæ;" and an essay "On the Regal Government of England." Died, 1635.

VERTOT D'ANBREUF, RENE AUBERT DE, a French historian, was born at Brinetot, in Normandy, in 1655. He entered into the order of Capuchins; but the asceticism of that society not agreeing with his health, he was induced to exchange it for the Premonstratenses, in which he became prior of the monastery; but this he also quitted, and settled at Paris as a secular ecclesiastic. His talents soon procured him distinction, and he was appointed secretary to the duke and dukes of Orleans, historiographer of the order of Malta, and commander of Sanier. His chief works relate to the revolutions of Portugal, Sweden, and Rome; but though they are lively, elegant, and interesting, he wanted the necessary industry and research to render them valuable as historical documents.

VERTUE, GEORGE, an eminent engraver and antiquary, was born in London, in 1664. Having acquired the patronage of Sir Godfrey Kneller and the earl of Oxford, he soon rose into note, and was employed by most of the nobility who patronized the arts. The works of Vertue are extremely numerous; and they are valuable on account of their accuracy, though deficient in spirit. He made many journeys through England, in the course of which he took drawings of churches, monuments, and ruins; employing himself also in collecting "Anecdotes of Painting in England," which were subsequently published.

by lord Orford, in 5 vols. 4to. He died in 1736.

VESALIUS, ANDREW, a celebrated anatomist, was born at Brussels, in 1514. When only eighteen, he composed his treatise "De Corporis Humani Fabrica;" and subsequently, by his lectures and demonstrations at Paris, Pisa, Bologna, &c., he acquired great reputation. He at length became physician to Charles V. and Philip II. of Spain; but when in the height of his fame, he suddenly engaged in a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. This journey, it is said, had been imposed on him by way of penance for having caused the death, by opening the body, of a young nobleman whom he had attended and supposed to be dead; but having made an incision, he discovered his error when too late. As he was returning from Jerusalem, to occupy the chair of medicine at Padua, left vacant by the death of of Fallopius, in 1563, he was shipwrecked on the island of Zante, and there died, from the effects of hunger and hardship, in the following year.

VESLING, JOHN, an eminent writer on natural history and anatomy, born at Minden, in Germany, in 1596. He studied at Vienna, and afterwards took a journey to Palestine, where he employed himself in botanical researches. Returning to Europe he obtained the professorship of anatomy at Padua; but he quitted that office to become keeper of the botanic garden. He afterwards visited Egypt, but died soon after his return, in 1648. He was the author of several works on the subject of his botanical researches in the East.

VESPASIAN, TITUS FLAVIUS, emperor of Rome, ascended the throne A.D. 70, and died in 79. He displayed throughout his reign a love of justice and moderation, publicly discountenanced vice and immorality, and was a patron of learned men.

VESTRIS, MARIE ROSE GOURGAUD DUGAZON, a distinguished French actress, in tragic characters, and in the higher walks of comedy. Died, 1804.

VESTRIS, GAETANO APOLINE BALTHAZAR, a celebrated professor of the art of dancing, born at Florence, in 1729; made his debut at the Parisian opera in 1748; and for many years was at the head of his profession in that gay capital. He retired with a pension in 1761; and died in 1808.

VICCARS, JOHN, a fanatical writer during the Commonwealth, was born in London, in 1582, and educated at Oxford. His tracts against church and king have the following quaint titles: "God's Ark overtopping the World's Waves;" "The burning Bush not consumed;" and "God in the Mount;" which were afterwards published together, under the general title of the "Parliamentary Chronicle." His violent rhapsodies were satirically alluded to by the author of Hudibras.

VICENTE, GIL, the earliest and most celebrated of the Portuguese comic poets. Born, 1480; died, 1537.

VICTOR, SEXTUS AURELIUS, a Roman historian, who lived in the fourth century. He was prefect of Pannonia in 381, and consular with Valentinian in 369. His works are, "Origo Gentis Romanæ;" "De Viris Illustribus Urbis Romanæ;" "De Caesaribus Historicis;" and "De Vita et Moribus Imperatorum Romanorum excerpta."

VICTORIUS or VETTORI, PETER, an eminent Italian scholar, was born at Florence, in 1490. When the revolution took place in his native city, he went to Rome, and resided there till Cosmo de' Medici invited him home, and appointed him to the Greek and Latin professorship. He wrote commentaries on Aristotle, Terence, Sallust, and other ancient authors; "Varie Lectiones," and Latin poems and orations. Died, 1565.

VIDA, MARCUS HIERONYMUS, a modern Latin poet, was born at Cremona, about 1480. After studying in his own country, he went to Rome, where his poem, entitled "Scacchum Ludæ," or the game of chess, procured him the patronage of Leo X. who suggested to him his celebrated "Christiad." Clement VIII. made VIDA apostolical secretary, and afterwards bishop of Alba, in which capacity he attended the council of Trent. Died, 1566.

VIETA, FRANCIS, a celebrated mathematician, was born at Fontenay, in Poitou, in 1540; and died in 1603. He was the first who used letters in algebra to designate known quantities.

VIGEE, L. G. B., a French homme de lettres, born in 1755. At the revolution he espoused its cause, and published an "Ode to Liberty;" was deprived of his own under the reign of terror; sung the praises of Maria Louisa and the king of Rome under Napoleon; and the glories of the Bourbon lily under Louis XVIII. and Charles X.

VIGNOLA, or GIACOMO BAROZZIO, a celebrated Italian architect, was born in 1507, at Vignola. While studying at Rome, he formed an acquaintance with Bramante, who took him to Paris, where he made the bronze casts at Fontainebleau. Returning to Italy, he designed the church of Petronius, at Bologna, and built some elegant palaces in that city. Settling afterwards at Rome, he was appointed architect to the pope, and succeeded Michael Angelo as superintendent of St. Peter's. Died, 1572. He was the author of a work "On the Five Orders of Architecture," &c.

VILLA-FRANCA, Prince JOSEPH, a Sicilian, born in 1764. In 1811 he was a member of the Harmonial Chamber, which prepared the Sicilian constitution of 1812, in which he was president of the Chamber of Peers; in 1813, foreign secretary; and on the fall of the constitution in 1814, he retired to France. On the Neapolitan constitution being proclaimed in 1820, he was president of the Junta. When it was suppressed by Austria, he again withdrew into private life.

VILLALPANDI, JOHN BAPTIST, a learned Spanish jesuit, was born at Cordova, in 1532; he applied his mathematical knowledge to the elucidation of the Scriptural history, and a description of Solomon's Temple. Calmet's Dictionary contains some account of this curious inquiry, with several engravings in illustration of it. Died, 1608.

abbé, who attracted much attention at Paris, both by his talents as a preacher and by his lively conversation. He was the author of a book entitled "Le Comte de Gabille," for which he was ultimately forbidden the pulpit, and his book prohibited. It was from this work that Pope took the machinery of his Rape of the Lock. The abbé was killed by a band of robbers, in 175.

VILLARS, LOUIS HECTOR, duke de, marshal of France, was born at Moulins, in 1653. After gaining great reputation by a variety of services, he was, in 1704, sent to Languedoc against the insurgents of the Cevennes, and on his return to Paris he was made a duke. He contended against Marlborough, in the celebrated battle of Malplaquet, in 1712; defeated the Austrians at Denain; forced Eugene to raise the siege of Landrecy; and took several fortresses. On the death of Louis XIV., Villars was made member of the regency (1715), and minister of state, and was also admitted into the French academy. He died in 1734.

VILLENEUVE, N., a French admiral, born in 1711. He had the command of the combined French fleet at Cadiz, which was defeated by Lord Nelson at Trafalgar. He was taken prisoner by the British conqueror on that occasion, and brought to England. Napoleon was dissatisfied with his alleged disobedience of orders; and on his return to France, being ordered to remain at Rennes, he destroyed himself, according to Napoleon's statement to Barry O'Meara ("Voice from St. Helena"), by running a long pin into his heart: he had first purchased some anatomical engravings of that organ, in order to effect the purpose with more instantaneous certainty.

VILLOISON, JEAN BAPTISTE GASPARD D'ANSE DE, a celebrated French scholar, was born at Corbeille-sur-Seine, in 1750. He devoted his time in bringing to light valuable but forgotten Greek manuscripts; for which purpose he visited the principal libraries in Europe, and travelled to the East. He published the "Greek Lexicon to Homer by Apollonius," from a manuscript in the library of St. Germain-des-Prés; also "Anecdota Græca;" "Epistolæ Vinarianenses;" part of the Old Testament, from a translation made by a Jew in the ninth century, &c.; but his most important discovery was a copy of Homer, of the tenth century. He suffered considerably in his property during the Revolution; but on the restoration of order he resumed his literary career, and was appointed by Buonaparte professor of ancient Greek. Died, 1806.

VINCE, SAMUEL, F.R.S., an eminent mathematician and astronomer, was a native of Framlingham, in Suffolk. His parents were in a humble station of life; but by the generosity of Mr. Tilney, of Harleston, who had seen proofs of his abilities, he was educated at Caius college, Cambridge, where he soon distinguished himself by his superior acquisitions; and he eventually became Plumian professor of astronomy and experimental philosophy. His works on astronomy and the mathematical sciences generally, are numerous and important; the principal are, "A complete System of Astronomy," 3 vols. 4to.; "Elements of Conic Sections;" treatises on Fluxions, Hydrostatics, Trigonometry, &c.; "The Credibility of Christianity Vindicated;" "A Confutation of Atheism from the Laws of the Heavenly Bodies," &c. He obtained preferment in the church, and at the time of his decease was rector of Kirkby Bedon, vicar of South Creak, and archdeacon of Bedford. Died, 1621.

VINCENT, THOMAS, a pious nonconformist minister, who, during the great plague in London, in 1665, distinguished himself by his zeal in attending persons attacked with that malady. He wrote "God's Terrible Voice in the City by Plague and Fire;" an "Explanation of the Catechism;" and other religious books. Died, 1671.

VINCI, LEONARDA DA, an illustrious Italian painter, was born in 1452; and is allowed to have been one of the greatest geniuses of his country. He possessed correctness of design, taste, and great powers of expression; and composed a great number of discourses upon several curious subjects, none of which, however, were published, but a "Treatise on the Art of Painting." He died in 1520, at Fontainebleau, in the arms of Francis I.

VINCI, LEONARDO DA, an eminent musical composer, born at Naples, in 1680. He was poisoned by the relation of a Roman lady of rank, of whose favours he had boasted.

VINER, CHARLES, an able English lawyer, was born in 1680, at Aldershot, Hants. He was the founder of the Vinerian professorship at Oxford, and the compiler of a "General Abridgment of the Law of England," originally printed in 24 vols. folio. Died, 1736.

VIOTTI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a celebrated violinist, was born near Crescentino, in Piedmont, in 1755; and, in his twenty-first year, was made first violinist at the royal chapel in Turin. He afterwards visited Berlin and Paris. On the breaking out of the revolution, he took refuge in England; and, from the year 1794 till 1798, was leader in the orchestra of the Italian opera. Having received an order from the alien office to quit the country, he retired to Holland, and thence to Hamburgh. In 1801 he returned to London, engaged in the wine trade, and lost the whole of his property. After the restoration of the Bourbons, Louis XVIII. invited him to preside over the Académie Royale de Musique, at Paris. In 1822 he settled finally in London, and there remained till his death, in 1824. He was author of a great variety of music for the violin, and the first performer of his age.

VIRGIL, or PUBLIUS VIRGILIUS MARO, the prince of Latin poets, was born at Andes, near Mantua, about 70 years B.C. His first years were spent at Cremona; he next studied at Milan, and lastly at Naples; where he learnt Greek under Panthenius, and philosophy from Syro the Epicurean. Physic and mathematics constituted his favourite objects; and he embraced the doctrine of Plato. He removed to Rome when his country was partitioned out among the soldiers after the battle of Philippi. There, by means of his friend Mecenas, he was introduced to Augustus, who restored to him his estate. On this occasion he wrote his first "Eclogue;" and on completing the "Bucolics," he undertook the "Georgics." After these were finished, and had been read by Augustus, he began the "Æneid," at the request of the emperor. This great poem has left the palm of superiority undecided between Homer and Virgil. The poet was engaged eleven years upon this immortal work, but died, without revising it, at Brundisium, B.C. 19, aged 51. He left the greatest part of his property to Mecenas, Tiberius, and Augustus. His remains were interred on the road leading from Naples to Puteoli.

VIRGINIA, daughter of the centurion L. Virgilius. Appius Claudius, to obtain possession of her person, bribed a man to claim her as the daughter of his slave, when Appius, as judge, ordered her to be delivered into his hands. Virgilius, who was at the camp, being informed of this infamous outrage, hastened to Rome, and, in the presence of Appius and the Roman people, plunged a knife into his daughter's bosom. He then returned to the camp, where he harangued the soldiers, who instantly marched to Rome. Appius destroyed himself in prison, and the office of decemvir was abolished B.C. 449.

VIRIATHUS, an illustrious Lusitanian chief, who, in his patriotic endeavours to throw off the yoke of Rome, repeatedly defeated the Roman armies, and for fourteen years successfully defended his country and a part of Spain. He was at last murdered by his servants, who had been bribed by Cæpio, the Roman general, B.C. 40.

VISCONTI, JOHN BAPTIST ANTHONY, an Italian antiquary, was born at Vernazza, in 1722, and educated at Rome. He succeeded Winckelmann as commissary of antiquities, in 1768; had the chief management in forming the museum, under popes Clement XIV. and Pius VI.; and died in 1784.

VISCONTI, ENRIUS QUIRINUS, eldest son of the preceding, was born at Rome, in 1731, and was intended by his father for the church; but having formed an attachment to a lady whom he wished to marry, he refused to enter into orders. His knowledge of archæology was superior to that of his father, and his general talents were of the highest order. He was appointed conservator of the Pio-Clementine museum; and when the French took possession of Rome, and established a provisional government in 1797, he was nominated minister of the Interior. He afterwards retired to France; became a member of the Institute, professor of archæology, and surveyor of the museum of antiquities. Among his works are, "Grecian Iconography;" "Roman Iconography;" and the "Description of the Pio-Clementine Museum." Died, 1818.

VITRUVIUS, MARCUS POLLIO, a celebrated writer on architecture, who flourished in the reigns of Julius Cæsar and Augustus, and is supposed to have been born at Formia, in Campania. His excellent work, "De Architectura," has been often published.

VIVES, JOHN LOUIS, one of the revivers of literature, was born at Valencia, in Spain, in 1492. He studied at Paris and Louvain, after which he visited England, and in 1517 was chosen one of the first fellows of Corpus Christi college, Oxford. He was also employed in the education of the princess Mary, for whose use he composed his "De Ratione studii puerilis," and "De institutione famine Christianæ;" but venturing to argue and write against Henry the Eighth's divorce from Catherine, he was disgraced and imprisoned. On regaining his liberty he repaired to Brussels, where he married, and remained for the rest of his life, occupied as a teacher of the belles lettres. He died in 1541.

VIVIANI, VINCENTIO, a celebrated Italian mathematician, was born at Florence, in 1621. He was the disciple of Galileo, after whose death he was much employed in public works by the grand duke of Tuscany, who appointed him his first mathematician, and chief engineer. He restored a part of the lost works of Aristotle and Apollonius, and wrote several valuable treatises on geometry, &c. Died, 1702.

VOET, or VOETIUS, GISEBERT, a Dutch theologian, was born at Heu-deu, in 1592. Having studied at Leyden, he first settled as a minister at his native place, where he remained till 1631. He afterwards went to Utrecht, where he was professor of divinity and the oriental languages. He distinguished himself by his attacks on the Armenians; and when the Cartesian philosophy was engaging the public attention, he wrote against Descartes with such asperity and liberality. His principal works are, "Selectæ Disputationes Theologice," 5 vols. 4to.; and "Politica Ecclesiastica," 4 vols. 4to. Died, 1677.—PAUL VOET, his son, who also died in 1677, was, successively, professor of logic, metaphysics, and civil law, at Utrecht; was the author of several learned works on theology and jurisprudence.—JOHN VOET, son of Paul, professor of law at Leyden, was the author of a valuable "Commentary on the Pandects." Died, 1714.

VOISENON, CLAUDE HENRY FRESER DE, a French dramatist and poet, was born near Melun, in 1708; was educated for the ecclesiastical profession, and became grand-vicar of Boulogne. He was of a lively, humorous disposition, and conscientiously refused the bishopric of Boulogne, from a sense of his unfitness for the episcopal office; but chose to pursue those studies for which by nature he was qualified. In 1763 he was admitted a member of the French academy; and he spent his life in literary pursuits, too freely mingled with licentiousness. Like Piron, he had his days of dissoluteness, and his moments of devotion. He wrote "Literary Anecdotes," comedies, and fugitive poetry; and died in 1773.

wit and poet, born at Amiens, in 1598. His manners were highly agreeable, and he became master of the ceremonies to Gaston, duke of Orleans. In 1634 he was admitted into the French Academy, and was subsequently sent on a mission to Spain, where he was much caressed, and where he composed some verses in such pure and natural Spanish, that they were universally ascribed to Lopez de Vega. Under the administration of cardinal Mazarine, Voiture was in the zenith of his reputation, and enjoyed large pensions; but gambling, and other vicious habits, kept him poor. He wrote verses in French, Spanish, and Italian; but his letters were the chief basis of his literary reputation, and in their day were extravagantly admired. He died in 1648.

VOLKOFF, THEODORE, a Russian dramatist, was born at Gostroma, in 1729. He wrote several plays, and erected a theatre at Jaroslaw, where his success was such, that the empress Elizabeth sent for him to St. Petersburg, and appointed him first actor of the Russian theatre. In 1759, he was sent to establish a national theatre at Moscow; and Catharine II. bestowed on him an estate, with a patent of nobility. He died in 1763; and his funeral obsequies were celebrated with great magnificence.

VOLNEY, CONSTANTINE FRANCIS CHAMBERLAIN, count de, peer of France, a celebrated French writer, was born at Craon, in Brittany, in 1745. He was educated at Angers, and studied medicine at Paris; but coming into possession of a small estate, he was enabled to gratify his ardent love of travel. He spent nearly three years in Egypt and Syria; and on his return to France, in 1787, published his "Voyage en Syrie et en Egypte," 2 vols., which was translated into the English and other languages, and procured him an extensive reputation. He was elected a member of the states-general; was confined nearly a twelvemonth during the reign of terror; was appointed professor of history at the normal school in 1794; went to America in the following year, and resided there till 1796; was created a senator and count, during Napoleon's consulship; and on the restoration of the Bourbons, he was designated a member of the chamber of peers. In all situations, however, he was the defender of liberal principles. Among his principal works are his "Ruins, or Meditations on the Revolutions of Empires;" "Lectures on History;" and "New Researches on Ancient History." Died, 1820.

VOLPATO, GIOVANNI, an eminent Italian engraver, born at Bassano, in 1733. He was a self-taught artist, and acquired a degree of excellence in his profession rarely equalled. He was engaged to make engravings from the paintings of Raphael at the Vatican. Died, 1802. Volpato wrote the "Principles of Design;" and Raphael Morgan was his pupil and son-in-law.

VOLTA, ALESSANDRO, a celebrated experimental philosopher, was born at Como, in 1745. He laid the foundation of his fame, by two treatises, which described a new electrical machine; was for thirty years professor of natural philosophy at Pavia; was made an Italian count and senator by Napoleon; and died in 1826. Volta directed his attention particularly to the subject of galvanism, or animal electricity, in which science he made many discoveries and improvements; but the great invention which immortalizes his name, is the Voltaic pile, or electrical column. His works form 3 vols. 8vo.

VOLTAIRE, FRANCIS MARIE AROUET DE, the most celebrated literary character of his age, was born at Chatenay, near Paris, in 1694, and received his education in the Jesuit's college of Louis XIV. Here he displayed talents which warranted the highest expectations; and having recited from memory, a poem of Rousseau, before the celebrated Ninon de l'Enclos, she was so pleased with the talent of the boy, that she left him a legacy of 2000 livres to purchase a library. His father intended him for the law, but he declined to follow that profession, and assiduously cultivated his taste for literary pursuits. In 1716, he was imprisoned in the Bastille, on an unfounded suspicion of having written a libel on the government; and while there, he formed the plan of the "Henriade," and completed the tragedy of "Edipus," which was represented in 1718 with singular success. A second unjust confinement in the Bastille induced him to take up his residence in England for three years, where he was favourably received, and obtained a most liberal subscription for his "Henriade." On his return to France in 1730, he published his "Brutus," which was followed by "Zara," the most affecting of his tragedies. His next work, the "Lettres Philosophiques," gave such offence by its profaneness, that the parliament of Paris condemned the book to be burnt, and warrants were issued for apprehending the author. He therefore passed some years in concealment at Cirey, near Vassy, in Champagne, where he was treated with the greatest kindness by the mistress of the estate, the Marchioness du Chatelet, and wrote his "Elémens de la Philosophie de Newton," to make his countrymen acquainted with the great discoveries of the English philosopher. He also produced the plays of "Alzira" and "Mahomet," which last was censured as immoral and irreligious; but his "Merope," brought out in 1743, was received with such applause, that the poet became a favourite at court, and was appointed gentleman of the bed-chamber and historiographer of France. In 1746 he obtained admission into the Academy of Sciences, on which occasion he broke through the old custom of panegyricizing cardinal Richelieu; but this innovation created him so many enemies, that he retired to Lunéville, and did not return to Paris till 1749. The year following he went to Berlin, at the invitation of the king of Prussia, who made him one of his chamberlains, and gave him a pension. The greatest intimacy for a time subsisted between them; but he at length drew upon himself Frederic's displeasure, and quitted Prussia, carrying with him the poetical works of the king, who caused him to be arrested on the road, till the fugitive manuscript was restored. Voltaire then went to Colmar, whence he removed to Geneva, and afterwards settled at Ferney, a village in the Pays de Gex, where he resided during the remainder of his life, with his niece, Madame Denis. He also induced many ingenious artisans to settle there, whose works he sent to Russia, Germany, Spain, Italy, and Holland. At the beginning of the year 1778 he went to Paris, where he was received with many flattering marks of distinction; but his incessant literary labours, and the change from his accustomed manner of life, affected his health so much, that he observed, "I have come to Paris to find my glory and my grave." Having taken a large dose of opium, without the advice of his physician, it is thought to have hastened his death, which took place May 30, 1778. Besides his poetical works, he wrote an "Essay on General History;" the "Age of Louis XIV.;" "Life of Charles XII. of Sweden;" "History of the Czar Peter the Great;" the romances of "Candide," "Zadig," and some others. His collected works form 70 vols. 8vo. He had stupendous talents; but there were many parts of his character by no means great or estimable.

VOLTERRA, DANIEL DE, an Italian painter and sculptor, who was employed, under the pontificate of Paul IV., to cover the nudities of some of the figures in the Last Judgment of Michael Angelo, which obtained for him the ludicrous title of Braghettone. Died, 1566.

VONDEL, JOOST VANDEN, a Dutch poet, born in 1587. He wrote thirty-two tragedies, and many poems; and translated Virgil, Horace, and Ovid. Died, 1697.

VOPISCUS, FLAVIUS, a native of Syracuse, who flourished A.D. 304. He wrote the history of Aurelian, Tacitus, Florianus, Probus, Firmus, Carus, &c.

VORSTIUS, CONRAD, a theological writer, was born at Cologne, in 1569. James I. of England caused his book "Tractatus Theologicus de Deo" to be burnt, and complained to the states against the author, who was banished from Holland, and died at Toulagen, in 1622.

VOS, MARTIN DE, a painter, was born at Antwerp, about 1534; and died there in 1604. He painted history, portraits, and landscapes, in a very fine style.—SIMON DE VOS, another artist of Antwerp, was born in 1603, and died about 1670. He painted historical subjects, and portraits; but excelled in hunting pieces.

VOSSIUS, GERARD JOHN, an eminent critic and philologist, was professor of chronology and eloquence at Leyden, and of history at Amsterdam. His works are frequently referred to as authorities, particularly the following: "De Historicis Græcis;" "De Historicis Latinis;" and "Ars Historica." Born, 1577; died, 1649.

VOSSIUS, ISAAC, son of the preceding, was born at Leyden, in 1618, and, possessing great natural talents, very early acquired a high reputation among the learned. In 1670 he came to England, and obtained from Charles II. a canonry of Windsor, and the degree of doctor of laws from the university of Oxford. He died in 1688. His works are numerous and erudite. He was rude in his manners, and sceptical in his religious notions, but so credulous in other matters, that Charles II. said, "he is a strange man for a divine, for there is nothing which he refuses to believe, except the Bible."

VOUET, SIMON, an eminent French painter, was born at Paris, in 1582; and after a residence of fourteen years in Italy, was sent for by Louis XIII. to assist in the decorations of the Louvre and the Luxembourg. Died, 1646.

VROON, HENRY CORNELIUS, a Dutch painter, born at Haarlem, in 1586. He was famous in sea-pieces; and drew the designs for the tapestry in the House of Lords, representing the details of the defeat of the Spanish armada.

VULSON, MARC DE, sieur de la Colombe, a writer on heraldry. Having, while he resided at Grenoble, in 1681, surprised his wife with a gallant, and killed them both on the spot, he rode post to Paris to solicit a pardon, which he obtained. Died, 1688. His works on the heraldic science are much esteemed.

W.

WACE, ROBERT, an Anglo-Norman poet of the 12th century. He was a native of Jersey, and became chaplain to Henry II., king of England, who gave him a canonry in the cathedral of Bayeux. He wrote, in Norman-French verse, a history of England, an account of the Norman conquest, and some romances.

WATCHER, JOHN GEORGE, a learned German linguist and antiquary; author of "Glossarium Germanicum;" "Archæologia Nummaria," &c. Died, 1738.

WADING, or WADDING, LUKE, an Irish ecclesiastic, born at Waterford, in 1588. He held a divinity professorship in the university of Salamanca; but having accompanied the bishop of Carthage to Rome, he continued to reside there during the remainder of his life. He refused a cardinal's hat, and founded the college of St. Isidore, for Irish students of the Franciscan order; but he is said to have greatly encouraged the Irish rebellion in 1641. He wrote a "History of the Order of St. Francis;" and edited the works of Dom Scotus, Calasio's Concordance, &c. Died, 1657.

WADING, PETER, a learned Irish Jesuit, was born at Waterford; became chancellor of the university of Gratz, in Styria; was the author of numerous metrical and other works in the Latin language; and died in 1644.

WADHAM, NICHOLAS, the founder of Wadham college, Oxford, was born in 1516, in Somersetshire, and was educated at Christchurch college. He died in 1610; and the seminary which bears his name was completed in 1613.

WADSTROM, CHARLES BERN, a Swedish traveller and philanthropist, was born at Stockholm, in 1746. Having visited Africa, with a view to acquire information that might lead to the abolition of the slave-trade, he was, on his return to Europe, examined at the bar of the English House of Commons upon that subject; and he afterwards published his "Observations on the Slave Trade," &c. Died, 1799.

WAFER, LIONEL, an English voyager, was originally a surgeon in the navy. Having accompanied Dampier, the circumnavigator, and quarrelled with him, he was left on shore on the banks of Darien; but owing to his medical skill the Indians treated him kindly, and gave him his liberty when an English vessel arrived on the coast. On his return, in 1680, he published an interesting account of his adventures.

WAGENAAR, JOHN, a Dutch historian, was born at Amsterdam, in 1709. He was the author of the "History of Holland," 21 vols.; for which he was appointed historiographer to his native city. He also wrote "The present State of the United Provinces," 12 vols. &c. Died, 1773.

WAGENSEIL, JOHN CHRISTOPHER, an eminent German scholar and polemic, was born at Nuremberg, in 1633. He was educated at Altorf; where, in 1667, he was made professor of history and jurisprudence. His "Ieha Ignea Sathana," a controversial treatise, in refutation of the Jewish writers on the Christian religion, is a work of great ability. Died, 1703.

WAGSTAFFE, THOMAS, a learned divine, was born in Warwickshire, in 1645. He practised physic for some time, and in 1693 was consecrated a conjuring bishop. He published several Sermons, and an able "Vindication of King Charles I. proving him the author of the Icon Basilike." Died, 1712.

WAGSTAFF, WILLIAM, F.R.S., a humorous writer, was born at Cublington, in Buckinghamshire, in 1665. He practised medicine in London, and became physician to Bartholomew's hospital. Died, 1725.

WAHLENBERG, GEORGE, an eminent botanist, was born in the province of Warmland, in 1744. He visited the remote parts of the Scandinavian peninsula, and most of the northern countries of Europe, for the purpose of making botanical and geological researches; and on his return to Upsal, where he was superintendent of the museum of science, he published his "Flora Lapponica;" "Flora Carpathorum;" "Flora Upsalienis;" and "Flora Suecica;" besides some geological treatises. Died, 1814.

WAILLY, CHARLES DE, an eminent French architect, was born in 1729, at Paris; studied at Rome; was a member of the Institute, and a founder of the Society of the Friends of the Arts. He died in 1796. Among the buildings which he designed are, the Spinola palace at Genoa, the mansion of Ormes in Touraine, and the Odeon at Paris.

WAILLY, NOEL FRANCIS DE, a French lexicographer, was born at Amiens, in 1724; settled at Paris; became a member of the Institute; and died in 1801. He published an "Abridgement of the Dictionary of the Academy;" "General and Particular Principles of the French Language;" and other works; and edited various classics.

WAITHMAN, a well-known alderman and M.P. for London, was born near Wrexham, in Denbighshire, in 1763; served his apprenticeship to his uncle, a linen draper at Bath; and for many years carried on that business in Fleet-street, London. He obtained much notoriety as a city orator, and by strenuously advocating popular rights on all occasions, was regarded, by a large class of the citizens, as a champion of freedom. He consequently not only obtained a civic gown, but filled the office of lord mayor, and was elected four times to represent the city of London in parliament. He died in 1833; and his friends erected an obelisk to his memory, opposite to that raised in honour of Mr. Wilkes, at the foot of Ladgate-hill.

WAKE, SIR ISAAC, an able diplomatist, and miscellaneous writer, born at Billing, in Northamptonshire, in 1573. He became fellow of Merton college, Oxford; and, in 1601, was chosen public orator of that university. He was afterwards employed as ambassador to several foreign courts; and in 1619, received the honour of knighthood. He wrote several works, the principal of which was his "Rex Platonicus." Died, 1632.

WAKE, WILLIAM, archbishop of Canterbury, a learned and exemplary prelate, was born at Blandford, in Dorsetshire, in 1657, and educated at Oxford. Having entered into orders, he soon distinguished himself by the zeal with which he espoused the Protestant cause, though in opposition to the wishes of the court; and he was accordingly well received by William III. on his accession to the throne. He was, successively, king's chaplain, rector of St. James's, Westminster, and dean of Exeter. In 1705 he was advanced to the bishopric of Lincoln; and, in 1716, he was raised to the see of Canterbury; in which station he distinguished himself by his moderation, firmness, and liberality. He endeavoured to promote a union of the English and Gallican churches, for which he was grossly calumniated, though the measure was well meant, and had it taken effect, the papal power would have been greatly weakened. He published a translation of the "Epistles of the Apostolical Fathers;" an "Explication of the Church Catechism;" and three volumes of "Sermons." Died, 1737.

WAKEFIELD, GILBERT, an eminent scholar and critic, was born at Nottingham, in 1756. He took his degree of B.A. at Jesus college Cambridge, in 1776, and at the same time was elected to a fellowship. On entering into orders, he served a curacy at Stockport, in Cheshire, and next at Liverpool; but he grew dissatisfied with the doctrines of the church of England, and left it to become classical teacher in the academy at Warrington. In 1790 he removed to the dissenting college at Hackney, his connexion with which ended in about a year. Soon after this he published a pamphlet against Public Worship, which startled many of his most ardent admirers, and was answered chiefly by dissenters. He wrote some pamphlets against government, of which no notice was taken, until his letter to the bishop of Landaff appeared, when the attorney general instituted a prosecution against him and the publisher. Mr. Wakefield was sentenced to be imprisoned two years in Dorchester goal, from which he was liberated in May, 1801, but died of a fever in September following. The principal of his works are, a "Translation of the New Testament," 2 vols.; "Tragediarum Græcarum Selectæ," 3 vols.; an edition of "Lucretius," 3 vols.; an "Inquiry into the Opinions of the Christian Writers of the three first Centuries, concerning the Person of Jesus Christ," 4 vols.; and the "Silva Critica."

WAKEFIELD, PRISCILLA, well known by the many ingenious works which she wrote to promote juvenile improvement. She was the original promoter of banks for the savings of the poor, which are now become so general. She resided for many years at Tottenham, in Middlesex; but died at Ipswich, in Suffolk, in 1832, aged 82.

WALBAUM, JOHN JULIUS, a German physician and naturalist, was born at Wolfenbutter, in 1734. He settled at Lubeck, where he attained great reputation; published several valuable works; and died in 1799.

WALDENIS, THOMAS, an English Carmelite, whose real name was Netter, was born at Walden, in Essex, about 1367. He studied at Oxford; and in 1409 was sent by Henry IV. to the council of Pisa. Henry V. reposed entire confidence in him; and he became no less a favourite with the young monarch, whom he attended to France, and died there in 1430.

WALKES, WILLIAM, a mathematician and astronomer, was born about 1734; went to Hudson's Bay, in 1769, to observe the transit of Venus; accompanied captain Cook in two voyages round the world; became mathematical master at Christ's hospital, and secretary to the Board of Longitude; and died in 1798. Among his works are, "Astronomical Observations on the Southern Hemisphere;" a treatise on the "Discovery of the Longitude by means of Time-pieces;" and an "Inquiry into the Population of England and Wales."

WALKER, CLEMENT, a political writer of the 17th century, was born at Cliffe, in Dorsetshire; was educated at Christ-church Oxford; and became M.P. for Wells. Being a zealous presbyterian, he was violently hostile to the Independents, against whom he published, in 1648, "A History of Independency." He also attacked the protector in a treatise called "Cromwell's Slaughter House." He was committed to the Tower, and died there in 1651.

WALKER, SIR EDWARD, an historian and herald, was born at Netherstowey, in Somersetshire. He was made clerk of the privy-council in 1644, and received the honour of knighthood; attended Charles II. in his exile, and was appointed by him garter-king-at-arms. Died, 1677. He wrote "Iter Carolinum, or an Account of the Marches, &c. of King Charles I.;" "Military Discoveries;" "Historical Discourses," &c.

WALKER, WILLIAM, a learned divine of the 17th century, was born in Lincolnshire; educated at Trinity college, Cambridge; became master of the free-school at Louth, and next of that at Grantham; and had the credit of instructing Sir Isaac Newton. Among his works are, "A Treatise of English Particles;" "Tropeologia Rhetorica;" "Explanation of Lilly's Grammar;" and "Idiomatologia Anglo-Latina." Died, 1684.

WALKER, GEORGE, was born of English parents, at Tyrone, in Ireland; and is celebrated for his stubborn defence of Londonderry, against James II. He enjoyed much favour with William III., whom he accompanied throughout his Irish campaigns, and fell at the battle of the Boyne, in 1690.

WALKER, THOMAS, a dramatic performer of some note, in the time of Garrick, was born in London, in 1690. He had all the physical requisites for a good actor; excelled in Macbeth, Hotspur, Falstaff, &c., and was in high favour with the public. Died, 1743.

WALKER, JOHN, a lexicographer, was born in 1732, at Friern Barnet, in Hertfordshire. He was at one time master of an academy at Kensington; and subsequently a lecturer on elocution, which art he had originally studied with a view to the stage. His principal works are, a "Pronouncing Dictionary;" a "Rhyming Dictionary;" "Elements of Elocution;" and a "Rhetorical Grammar." Died, 1807.

WALKER, ADAM, a lecturer on astronomy and a miscellaneous writer, was a native of Westmoreland, and born in 1731. His father was a woollen manufacturer, in which business he was placed at an early age, and his turn for mechanics very soon developed itself in the construction of models of corn-mills, paper-mills, &c. After showing great perseverance in obtaining knowledge from books, under the most disadvantageous circumstances, and being successively an usher, a tradesman, and a schoolmaster, he became a lecturer on astronomy, visiting most of the principal cities and towns in the kingdom, in that capacity. At length, in 1774, he fixed his abode in the metropolis, and continued to read a course of lectures every winter, at his house in George-street, Hanover-square. He wrote an "Analysis of his Lectures," a "System of Familiar Philosophy in Lectures," a "Treatise on Geography," "Remarks made in a Tour to the Lakes," &c. His mechanical skill was apparent in his Eidouranon, or transparent orrery, and the revolving lights on the rocks of Scilly. Died, 1821.—His son, WILLIAM, was also a public lecturer on astronomy and natural philosophy. Born, 1796; died, 1816.

WALKER, JOHN, a physician and geographical writer, was born in 1739, at Cockermouth, in Cumberland. After passing through various occupations, he rose to some eminence as a medical practitioner; and, at the time of his decease, he was at the head of the London vaccine institution. He published "Elements of Geography;" a "Universal Gazetteer;" and some medical treatises. Died, 1630.

WALKER, THOMAS, a barrister and police magistrate, was born in 1704. Having a natural turn for humorous anecdote, and mixing much in society, this gentleman hoarded up the smart sayings and witty conversations which fell from his clever companions in their hours of relaxation; and at length he resolved to make the world acquainted with the "fond conceits" with which his brain was stored. Hence arose the weekly periodical, called "The Original," of which twenty-six numbers only made their appearance. In consequence of indisposition he went over to the Continent, and while at Brussels was attacked rather suddenly, and died Jan. 20, 1836.

WALL, JOHN, an eminent physician, was born in 1708, at Powick, in Worcestershire; was educated at Worcester grammar-school, and at Merton college, Oxford; and, settling at Worcester as a medical practitioner, he first made known the virtues of the Malvern waters, and contributed to establish the porcelain manufactory. Died, 1776.

WALL, WILLIAM, who for upwards of half a century was the incumbent of Shoreham, in Sussex, was the author of a valuable work, entitled the "History of Infant Baptism." He also wrote "Critical Notes on the Old Testament," 2 vols., &c. Died, 1728.

WALL, MARTIN, son of the preceding, and who was also an eminent physician, was born in 1744, and was educated at New college, Oxford. On the death of Dr. Parsons, in 1786, he was elected clinical professor of that university, and spent the remainder of his life at Oxford, where he enjoyed a high reputation for medical skill, and was much esteemed for his social qualities. Died, 1824.

WALLACE, SIR WILLIAM, a celebrated Scotch patriot and hero, was the younger son of Sir Malcolm Wallace of Ellerslie, in Renfrewshire, and born in 1276. He possessed great strength and undaunted courage; and being indignant at seeing his country enslaved by Edward I., he resolved to undertake its liberation. His success at the head of a small band of followers induced many of the barons to join him, and he gained a splendid victory over earl Warenne, at Cambuskenneth, on the banks of the Forth. He was appointed regent; but his elevation having excited jealousy among the nobles, he resigned the regency. Edward having been informed of his success, hastened home from Flanders, and with a large army defeated the Scots, at Falkirk, which compelled Wallace to retreat to the mountains, and resort to his original system of predatory warfare. For seven years he continued to harass the English; but, in 1305, he was betrayed into the hands of Edward, by Sir John Monteith, who sent him in chains to London, where he was executed as a traitor. The heroic deeds of Wallace have been the frequent theme of the poet and the historian, and his memory is still cherished in Scotland with affection.

WALLENSTEIN, or WALSTEIN, ALBERT WINCKELADE, duke of Friedland, a celebrated German general, was born in Bohemia, in 1533. He obtained an immense fortune by marriage, which he applied to the raising of a formidable army for the service of the emperor. These were paid partly from his own resources and partly from plunder; and for several years he distinguished himself by his successes in the north of Germany; for which he was rewarded with the dukedom of Mecklenburgh and Friedland. In 1632 Wallenstein was declared head of the Catholic army, with power to act independently of the council. He was at first successful against Gustavus, but was ultimately defeated at the celebrated battle of Lutzen, where the death of the Swedish monarch dearly purchased the victory. He was at length accused of treason; and perished by the treachery of some of his own officers. Wallenstein possessed much prudence, knowledge of mankind, and cunning, especially the art of fathoming the intentions of others and concealing his own. Towards those who were dependent on him he was severe, and not unfrequently cruel; but he was lavish to those whom he wished to gain over to his purposes.

WALLER, SIR WILLIAM, an eminent general of the parliamentary army in the reign of Charles I., was born in 1597, in Kent, and was educated at Magdalen college and Hart-hall, Oxford. On his returning from Germany, where he had served as a volunteer against the emperor, he was elected for Andover as a member of the long parliament. He opposed the court, and, on the breaking out of the war, was made second in command under the earl of Essex. The west of England was the scene of his principal exploits; and in the early part of his career he fought with signal success, but was ultimately defeated. The self-denying ordinance removed him from service, and he became so much an object of suspicion to the republicans, that he was twice imprisoned. He died in 1666. He wrote "Divine Meditations," and a "Vindication of his Character and Conduct."

WALLER, EDMUND, an English poet, was born at Coleshill, in Warwickshire, and was educated at Eton, and at King's college, Cambridge. He was elected a member of parliament when in his seventeenth year; and at the age of twenty-three he married a rich heiress, who died soon after, and left him an infant daughter. Waller then paid his addresses to lady Dorothea Sidney, daughter of the earl of Leicester, whom he has immortalized under the poetical name of Sacharissa; but though she admired his verses, she slighted his offers, and married the earl of Sunderland. He then espoused a lady of the name of Bresse, by whom he had thirteen children. In the long parliament he represented Agmondenham, and was appointed one of the commissioners to treat with the king; but in 1648 he was taken up for a plot, when, to save his life, he made a confession, and, after a year's imprisonment, and paying a fine of 10,000*l.*, obtained his liberty. He then went to France, and resided there till he found himself getting to the end of his resources, when he applied to Cromwell, who gave him leave to return, and restored his estate. Waller repaid the favour by a panegyric on the Protector; but he was equally lavish of his praise on Charles II., with whom he was a favourite; as he also was with James II.; and he appears to have taken advantage of his intimacy with that monarch to give him very sound advice. He now turned his thoughts to devotion, and composed "Divine Poems." He died at Beaconsfield, in 1667, aged 82. His intellectual powers were of a superior order; he was at once a prompt, elegant, and graceful speaker, while the wit and pleasantness of his conversation made him a favourite, even with those whom his subject pliancy must have disgusted. English versification is much indebted to him; and for ease, gaiety, brilliancy, and wit, his amatory poetry has not been surpassed.

WALLERIUS, JOHN GOTTECHALK, an eminent Swedish chemist and mineralogist; author of "Systema Mineralogicum;" "Chemia Physica;" and other excellent works on those sciences. Died, 1783.

WALLIS, JOHN, an eminent English mathematician and divine, was born in 1616, at Ashford, in Kent, and educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge. He was chosen, in 1649, Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford; and made keeper of the archives there, in 1659; was one of the earliest members of the Royal Society; and, after a long life devoted to science and his clerical duties, died in 1703. His mathematical works are included in three volumes; and his "Sermons" form a fourth.

WALMESLEY, CHARLES, a Roman Catholic divine, and an eminent mathematician, was a doctor of the Sorbonne, a monk of the Benedictine order, and vicar apostolic of the western district of England. He died at Bath, in 1797, aged 76. He was a member of the Royal Society, and the author of several mathematical treatises.

WALPOLE, ROBERT, earl of Orford, a celebrated statesman, was born in 1676, at Houghton, his father's seat in Norfolk, and was educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge. He entered parliament in 1701, as member for Castle Rising, which borough his father had represented; but in the following year he was elected for Lynn. In 1708 he was appointed secretary of war; in 1709, treasurer of the navy; and in 1710, one of the managers of Sacheverell's trial; but on the dissolution of the Whig ministry, he was dismissed from all his offices, expelled the house, and committed to the Tower, on the charge of breach of trust, and notorious corruption. This was looked upon as a mere party proceeding by a majority of the people; and on the accession of George I., the Whigs being again in the ascendant, he was made paymaster of the forces, and, subsequently, prime minister. In consequence of disputes with his colleagues, however, he was induced to resign in 1717, and he remained in opposition till 1720, when he once more became paymaster of the forces. His reputation as a financier induced all eyes to be directed towards him on the occurrence of the unprecedented disaster, arising from the bursting of the South Sea bubble; and Lord Sunderland being obliged to retire, Walpole was again raised to the high situation of premier, which he retained for two-and-twenty years. In spite of incessant attacks from political enemies of the most splendid talents. In 1742 he resigned, and was created earl of Orford. He was an able financier, a good tactician in debate, a most serviceable minister to the house of Brunswick, and a zealous friend of the Protestant succession. He died in 1745.

WALPOLE, HORATIO, lord, brother of the preceding, was born in 1678; held various offices under the government; and was an able diplomatist; was created a peer in 1736; and died in 1757. He wrote an answer to Bolingbroke's Letters on History; and some political pamphlets.

WALPOLE, HORACE, earl of Orford, the youngest son of Sir Robert, was born in 1718, and was educated at Eton, and at King's college, Cambridge. In 1741, he entered parliament, successively representing Callington, Castle Rising, and Lynn. But it was soon apparent that he took no delight in senatorial proceedings, and in 1768 he retired wholly from public business. Literature and the fine arts were the great sources of his delight; and much of his existence was pleasantly dedicated to the embellishment of his villa at Strawberry-hill, near Twickenham, and to the formation of a splendid collection of the relics of antiquity. He also established a private press, and printed several works there. In 1791 he succeeded to the earldom, but never took his seat in the House of Lords. His principal works are, "The Castle of Otranto;" "Historic Doubts of the Life and Reign of Richard III.;" "The Mysterious Mother;" a tragedy; "Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors;" and "the Anecdotes of Painting in England." Died, 1797.

WALSH, WILLIAM, a minor English poet of the 17th century. He was the friend of Dryden, and the patron of Pope; held a situation in the household of Queen Anne; and died in 1708. His poems are chiefly of an amatory character.

WALSH, EDWARD, an eminent physician, was born at Waterford, in Ireland, and graduated as M.D. at Edinburgh. He commenced his professional career as physician in a West India packet, and had much experience in the treatment of the yellow fever, which at that time was raging in Jamaica. He afterwards served as an army surgeon in Ireland during the rebellion, and in the expeditions to Holland and Copenhagen. With the 49th regiment he proceeded to Canada; was afterwards attached to the 6th dragoons, and sent to Spain; and, having accompanied the Walcheren expedition, he was promoted to the staff; went to the continent as physician to the forces; and ended his medico-medical career at the battle of Waterloo. Dr. Walsh published "A Narrative of the Expedition to Holland," and "Bagatelles, or Poetical Sketches." Died, 1842.

WALSINGHAM, THOMAS, an English chronicler of the 15th century, was a native of Norfolk, and a Benedictine of St. Albans. He was appointed historiographer royal, about 1440; and wrote "A History of England, from 1273 to the death of Henry V."

WALSINGHAM, SIR FRANCIS, an eminent statesman in the reign of Elizabeth, was born at Chilchurston, in Kent. After receiving his education at King's college, Cambridge, where he acquired an excellent knowledge of languages, he was several times employed on missions to France; and, in 1573, he was appointed one of the secretaries of state, and knighted. In 1583 he went on an embassy to James, king of Scotland; and three years afterwards, at as one of the commissioners on the trial of the unfortunate queen Mary. He was a man of subtle policy, sparing neither time, trouble, nor expense in carrying such measures as he thought likely to serve the cause of the queen, and embarrass her enemies. It has been said, that "he outdid the Jesuits in their own bow, and over-reached them in their equivocation," and that he kept fifty-three agents and eighteen spies in foreign courts. He died in 1590, aged 60.

WALTER, JOHN GOTTLIEB, a very celebrated German anatomist, was born at Königsberg, in 1734; studied at Frankfurt and Berlin; succeeded Meckel as first professor of anatomy and midwifery at the latter city, in 1774; and greatly distinguished himself by his numerous discoveries, the formation of an immense collection of anatomical specimens, and his works on the science. Died, 1818.

WALTER, FREDERICK AUGUSTUS, son of the preceding, born in 1764, obtained, in conjunction with his father, the direction of the anatomical museum at Berlin, and in 1805 was made first medical councillor. Died, 1826.

WALTHER, BERNARD, an eminent astronomer of Nuremberg, in the 15th century. He studied under and assisted Regiomontanus; and is regarded as the first discoverer of the regular effect of atmospheric refraction. Died, 1501.

WALTHER, JOHN GODFREY, the author of a German musical dictionary, historical and biographical, entitled "Musicalisches Lexicon," &c.

WALTHER, AUGUSTINE FREDERIC, an eminent physician and anatomist, who filled the professorial chair at Leipzig, and died in 1746.

WALTON, BRIAN, a learned prelate, was born at Cleveland, in Yorkshire, in 1600. He suffered considerably at the breaking out of the civil war, on which he fled to Oxford, where he formed the plan of a "Polyglot Bible," which was published in 6 vols. folio, and to which he principally owes his literary reputation. In 1660 he was preferred to the see of Chester, but died in London the year following.

WALTON, ISAAC, of piscatory fame, was born in 1593, at Stafford, and kept a linen-draper's shop in London, first in the Royal Exchange, and afterwards at the corner of Chancery-lane, Fleet-street; but about 1632 he married the sister of bishop Ken. and in the beginning of the civil war quitted the metropolis, and went to reside at Winchester, where he died in 1683. His "Complete Angler" has long afforded delight not only to those who are fond of that "innocent recreation," but to general readers, and has passed through numerous editions. He was also a biographer; and his Lives of Hooker, bishop Sanderson, Wotton, Donne, and Herbert, exhibit him as such, in a highly favourable light.

WANLEY, NATHANIEL, an English clergyman, residing at Coventry; author of "The Wonders of the Little World, or the History of Man." Died, about 1690.

WANLEY, HUMPHRY, son of the preceding, was born at Coventry, in 1673, and educated at Edmund-hall, Oxford; on leaving which university he became secretary to the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge; and afterwards librarian to the earl of Oxford, in whose service he died in 1726. Mr. Wanley formed a catalogue of Saxon manuscripts for Dr. Hickes's Thesaurus, and made numerous collections relative to archaeology and bibliography.

WARBECK, PETER, or PERKIN, an individual whose real history has been the subject of much speculation, made his appearance in England, in the reign of Henry VII. and assumed the character and title of Richard duke of York, the younger son of Edward IV., supposed to have been murdered in the Tower, together with his brother, by order of Richard III. Having been acknowledged by Margaret, duchess of Burgundy, as her nephew, he proceeded to claim the crown of England, and, landing in Cornwall, was joined by some thousands of insurgents. He laid siege to Exeter; but on the approach of the royal army, he fled to Beaulieu abbey, in Hampshire, which sanctuary he was induced to quit, under the promise of a pardon, and he was sent in custody to the Tower of London. He was there treated as an impostor, and eventually, in 1499, was hanged, drawn, and quartered. Henry VII. published an alleged confession of the captive, purporting that he was the son of one Warbeck or Osbeck, a converted Jew of Tournay; but many have asserted that he was an illegitimate son of Edward IV.

WARBURTON, JOHN, an English antiquary and herald; author of "Vallum Romanum." Born, 1682; died, 1759.

WARBURTON, WILLIAM, bishop of Gloucester, a very eminent theological writer, critic, and controversialist, was born at Newark-upon-Trent, in 1698. His works are very numerous; but those for which he is most celebrated are, "A Critical and Philosophical Inquiry into the Causes of Prodiges and Miracles, as related by Historians;" "The Alliance between Church and State;" "The Divine Legation of Moses;" "Vindication of Mr. Pope's Essay on Man;" and editions of Shakspeare, Pope, &c. Dr. Warburton was a man of vigorous faculties, a mind fervid and vehement, supplied by incessant and unlimited inquiry, with wonderful extent and variety of knowledge; but he was so proud of his literary powers, that he treated all who opposed him with contemptuous superiority and haughty disdain. He commenced his clerical career in 1726, as vicar of Griesley, in Nottinghamshire; was appointed, in 1746, preacher to the society of Lincoln's Inn; and rapidly advanced in his profession, becoming bishop of Gloucester in 1759. He died in June, 1779.

WARD, SETH, bishop of Salisbury, a learned prelate, chiefly distinguished for his skill in mathematics and astronomy. He was public spirited and munificent, contributing to several liberal undertakings, besides founding and endowing a college of nuns for ten clergymen's widows. Born, 1617; died, 1698.

WARD, JOHN, professor of rhetoric at Gresham college, was born in London in 1679, and died in 1754. He wrote the "Lives of the Gresham Professors;" "Lectures on Oratory," 2 vols. &c.

WARD, EDWARD, a burlesque poet and miscellaneous writer at the end of the 17th century, who wrote the "London Spy," and turned Don Quixote into Hudibrastic verse.

WARE, Sir JAMES, an eminent antiquary and historian, was born at Dublin, in 1594, and died in 1666. He wrote "De Præselebus Hibernia;" the "History and Antiquities of Ireland;" and several other works.

WARE, JAMES, an eminent surgeon and oculist, was born, about 1736, at Portsmouth. After having been demonstrator of anatomy at Cambridge, he formed a partnership in the metropolis with Mr. Watlen, which continued till 1791; after which he practised on his own account, and attained a first-rate reputation. Among his works are, "Observations on Ophthalmia;" "Remarks on Fistula Lacrymalis;" and "Chirurgical Observations." Died, 1815.

WARDLAW, HENRY, bishop of St. Andrew's, and founder of the university there, was preferred to that see by pope Benedict XIII. in 1404. Though a man of strict morals and great simplicity of character, he was a still greater enemy to what he believed to be heresy, than to immorality; and he accordingly condemned to the stake those who, unhappily for their temporal peace, questioned the doctrines of the Roman church. Died, 1440.

WARHAM, WILLIAM, an English prelate and statesman, was born in Hampshire, and educated at Winchester-school, and New college, Oxford. He successively became master of the rolls, lord chancellor, bishop of London, and archbishop of Canterbury. In 1515 he resigned the great seal on account of the differences between him and Wolsey; and died in 1532. He was the friend of Erasmus, and a great patron of literature.

WARING, Dr. EDWARD, an eminent English mathematician. He wrote "Miscellaneous Analytics;" "Meditationes Algebraicæ;" "Meditationes Analyticæ;" "An Essay on the Principles of Human Knowledge," and other works. Born, 1735; died, 1798.

WARNER, WILLIAM, an English poet of the 16th century; author of "Albion's England," a poem written in an elegant style. Born, 1558; died, 1609.

WARNER, JOHN, a learned prelate, born at Westminster in 1565. He was successively prebendary of Canterbury, dean of Lichfield, and bishop of Rochester; suffered much for his loyalty in the rebellion, but recovered his episcopal seat at the restoration; and died in 1666. He was the founder of the college at Bromley, Kent, for the widows of clergymen.

WARNER, Dr. FERDINANDO, an English divine, and a theological, biographical, historical, and medical writer. Born, 1703; died, 1766. His principal publications are "A System of Divinity," 3 vols.; an "Ecclesiastical History of England," 2 vols.; "The Life of Sir Thomas More;" and "The History of Ireland." His son, JOHN WARNER, published a translation of the "History of Friar Gerard," from the Spanish, 2 vols.; and a work on prosody, entitled "Metro-martion."

WARNER, RICHARD, a botanist, born in London, in 1711; died, 1775. He wrote "Plantæ Woodfordienses," &c.; and at his death, bequeathed his library to Wadham college, Oxford, where he had received his education.

WARREN, Sir PETER, an able English admiral, entered the navy when very young, and gradually rose to the rank of commodore. In 1745 he commanded a squadron, with which he attacked, and took possession of Louisbourg; and in 1747 he fell in with a French squadron, which he completely defeated, capturing several of their men-of-war. This last exploit rendered him very popular, and he was returned M.P. for Westminster. Died, 1752.

WARREN, Sir JOHN BORLASE, an eminent naval officer, was born in 1754, in Cornwall; was educated at Winchester school; and at an early age entered the navy. During the American war he performed several gallant actions, and rose to the rank of post-captain. On the breaking out of the French revolutionary war, he equally distinguished himself; particularly in capturing, off the coast of Ireland, the Hoche man-of-war, and six frigates laden with troops for the conquest of that island. After the peace of Amiens, he was appointed ambassador to Russia, in which post he remained until 1805. He attained the rank of admiral in 1810; and died in 1822.

WARREN, CHARLES, an eminent engraver, was a native of London, and for many years held a distinguished rank in his profession. He was the first who effectually removed the difficulties of engraving on steel. Died, 1821.

WARTON, Dr. JOSEPH, son of the Rev. Thomas Warton, professor of poetry at Oxford, was born in 1722, at Dunstond, in Surrey; was educated at Winchester school, and Oriel college, Oxford; became curate of Chelsea, and rector of Tamworth; and, in 1768, was advanced to the station of head-master at Winchester, where he presided with high reputation nearly thirty years. In 1788 he obtained a stall in the cathedral of Winchester, and the rectory of Easton, which he exchanged for Upham. In 1793 he retired from the school to his rectory of Wickham, in Hampshire, where he died in 1806. His chief works are an "Essay on the Writings and Genius of Pope," and translations from Virgil.

WARTON, THOMAS, brother of the preceding, was born in 1728; received his education at Winchester school and Trinity college, Oxford; and in his twelfth year he distinguished himself by his "Triumph of Iai," a poetical vindication of Oxford against the reflections of Macon. His "Observations on Spenser's Fairy Queen," published in 1754, made him advantageously known as a critic, and prepared the way for his election, in 1757, to the professorship of poetry at Oxford, which he filled for ten years with great ability. The first volume of his "History of English Poetry," was published in 1771, and the second and third, respectively, in 1778 and 1781. His plan was extensive, including the period from the eleventh to the eighteenth century; but when he had gone as far as the Elizabethan writers, he suspended, and ultimately abandoned, the undertaking. He succeeded Whitehead as poet-laureat; and died in 1790. Besides the works above noticed, he wrote some elegant poems, and performed various other literary labours.

WARWICK, SIR PHILIP, a political and historical writer, was born in Westminster, in 1608; was educated at Eton and Geneva; became a member of the long parliament, but was expelled the house for joining the king, to whom he was secretary; took up arms in the royal cause; was knighted by Charles II., and died in 1682. He was the author of a "Discourse on Government," and some interesting "Memoirs of king Charles I."

WASHINGTON, GEORGE, the first president of the United States of America, was born in 1732, in Westmoreland county, Virginia. His father died when he was only ten years of age; but his elder brother having married a connexion of lord Fairfax, proprietor of the northern part of Virginia, George was introduced to the acquaintance of that nobleman, who gave him, when in his eighteenth year, an appointment as surveyor of a certain portion of the before-mentioned territory. At the age of twenty he was a major in the colonial militia, and in 1755 he served under the unfortunate general Braddock; on whose fall he conducted the retreat in a masterly manner. He held the command of the Virginian troops till 1758, when he gave in his resignation on account of ill health. He now served his country as a senator, and was elected a member of the assembly for Frederick county, and afterwards for that of Fairfax. When the breach between Great Britain and her colonies was widened by mutual animosity, the eyes of his countrymen were fixed upon Mr. Washington; and accordingly, in June, 1775, he took the command of the army of America, at Cambridge, in New England. Of the particulars of that great revolution it is impossible here to give a detail. Suffice it to observe, that in his intrepidity, prudence, and moderation, the Americans were almost wholly indebted for that independence which was secured to them by the treaty of peace concluded in 1793. Soon after this event Washington resigned his commission to congress, and retired to his seat of Mount Vernon; a retreat from the toils of public life, which he afterwards quitted with sincere regret. In 1789 he was elected president of the United States, and was received at Philadelphia with the applause which he so well merited. He delivered his inaugural address on the 30th of April, and throughout his administration he acted up to the principles and promises therein contained. As before, in his military capacity, so now in his civil, he declined receiving anything beyond his actual expenditure, in his official character. He well knew that he was chosen as the man of the nation, the guardian of the universal weal; and in no instance did he act or appear otherwise. His incessant application to business impaired his robust constitution; and in 1796 he resigned his office; on which occasion he published a valedictory address to his countrymen, replete with the most excellent advice for their future conduct, and with the soundest views of their political state. He died Dec. 14, 1799, in the sixty-eighth year of his age; and left, for the admiration of posterity, a character unequalled for disinterested patriotism, undeviating consistency, and firmness of purpose, tempered with unaffected humanity.

WATELET, CLAUDE HENRY, a celebrated French writer on the fine arts and belles lettres. He held the office of receiver-general of the finances; and died in 1786.

WATERHOUSE, EDWARD, a miscellaneous writer; born in 1619; died, 1670. He wrote an "Apology for Learning and Learned Men;" "Defence of Arms and Armoury," &c.

WATERLAND, DANIEL, a learned divine and controversialist, was born in 1683, at Wasby, in Lincolnshire, and was educated at Magdalen college, Cambridge, of which he became master. At his death in 1740, he was chancellor of York, archdeacon of Middlesex, canon of Windsor, and vicar of Twickenham. Among his works are, "A History of the Athanasian Creed;" "Scripture Vindicated;" "A Defence of Christ's Divinity;" and "A Review of the Doctrine of the Eucharist."

WATERLOO, ANTHONY, an eminent Dutch painter, who lived in the early part of the 17th century, and excelled in landscapes.

WATSON, DAVID, a learned editor, best known as a translator of Horace, was born in Scotland, in 1710. He led an irregular life, and died in great poverty, in 1756.

WATSON, ROBERT, an historian, was born at St. Andrew's, in Scotland, in 1730. He obtained the professorship of logic, rhetoric, and belles-lettres at St. Andrew's, where he also became principal of the university, and died in 1790. Dr. Watson wrote "The History of Philip II.;" and commemorated that of Philip III., which was completed and published, for the benefit of his family, by Dr. Thomson.

WATSON, SIR WILLIAM, a physician, born in London, in 1715, was distinguished for his knowledge of natural philosophy, and his discoveries in electricity. Died, 1787.

WATSON, HENRY, colonel, a mathematician and engineer, was born at Holbeach, in Lincolnshire, in 1733. He greatly distinguished himself at the taking of the Havannah, and afterwards went to India as chief engineer. Died, 1786.

WATSON, RICHARD, a celebrated English prelate, was born in 1737, at Haversham, in Westmoreland; became a sizar, and afterwards a fellow, of Trinity college, Cambridge; was chosen, in 1764, professor of chemistry; and in 1771 he succeeded to that of divinity. He early distinguished himself by a display of his political opinions, in a sermon preached before the university, which was printed under the title of the "Principles of the Revolution Vindicated," and excited an unusual degree of public attention. In 1776 he printed "An Apology for Christianity," which he addressed to Gibbon. In 1782 he was advanced to the bishopric of Llandaf, with permission to hold the archdeaconry of Ely, his professorship, and other ecclesiastical preferments. On this promotion, he published a letter to the archbishop of Canterbury, containing a plan for equalizing church revenues. In 1796 the bishop appeared a second time as the defender of revealed religion, in his "Apology for the Bible," designed as an answer to Paine's Age of Reason. He was also the author of "Chemical Essays," 5 vols.; "Sermons;" and "Theological Essays." Died, 1816.

WATT, JAMES, a celebrated natural philosopher and civil engineer, was born at Greenock, in Scotland, in 1736, and began life as a mathematical instrument maker; in which capacity he was employed by the university of Glasgow, and he subsequently established himself in that city. But he soon turned his attention to the steam-engine, in which he made the most important improvements. He subsequently entered almost wholly upon the business of a civil engineer, particularly in planning and surveying canals; to aid him in which, he invented a new micrometer, and a machine for drawing in perspective. In 1774 he removed from Glasgow to Soho, near Birmingham, where he entered into partnership with Mr. Boulton, in the business of constructing steam-engines, which they carried to the height of perfection. After having given ample proofs of great mental endowments, Mr. Watt retired from business with a handsome fortune, which enabled him to enjoy the evening of a well-spent life with ease and comfort, in the bosom of his family. Died, 1819.

WATT, ROBERT, a physician and bibliographer, was born in 1774, in Ayrshire; became president of the faculty of physicians and surgeons at Glasgow; and died there, in 1819. He compiled the "Bibliotheca Britannica," and some medical treatises.

WATTEAU, ANTOINE, an eminent French painter, was born in 1684, at Valenciennes. He commenced as a scene-painter at Paris, but his admirable genius soon raised him above that humble occupation; and having produced a picture which gained the prize at the Academy, his ardour for the art increased, and he speedily rose to fame. Died, 1721.

WATTS, Dr. ISAAC, a celebrated dissenting divine of the independent persuasion, eminently distinguished for his learning and piety, was born at Southampton, in 1674, and educated at the free-school there, and next at an academy near London. He succeeded Dr. Chauncey as minister of a congregation in the metropolis; but nearly the last forty years of his life was spent in the family of his friend, Sir Thomas Abney, at Stoke Newington. Among his works, most of which still maintain their original popularity, are "Psalms and Hymns," a treatise on "Logic," and his "Improvement of the Mind." Died, 1748.

WAYNFLETE, WILLIAM, a magnificent prelate of the 15th century, whose real name was Patten, was born at Wainfleet, in Lincolnshire; and was educated at Winchester school, and at Oxford. He was made provost of Eton, in 1442; bishop of Winchester, in 1447; and lord chancellor, in 1456. Died, 1468. He was the founder of Magdalen college, Oxford, and of a free school at his native place.

WEBB, PHILIP CARTERET, a very distinguished English antiquary and law-writer. Born, 1700; died, 1770.

WEBBE, SAMUEL, an eminent English musician, particularly celebrated for his glees, was born in 1740, and was apprenticed to a cabinet-maker, but he abandoned his trade, and gained a subsistence by copying music. By study and perseverance he became an excellent composer, and also acquired several languages. Died, 1804. His glees and part songs form three volumes, and are much admired.

WEBBER, JOHN, an artist, born in London, in 1731, who in Cook's last voyage was appointed draughtsman to the expedition. Died, 1793.

WEBER, HENRY WILLIAM, an archæologist and miscellaneous writer, was born in 1763, at St. Petersburg, of German parents; studied medicine at Edinburgh and at Jena; settled in Scotland, where he devoted himself to literary pursuits, and died in 1816. Among his publications are, "Metrical Romances of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Centuries;" "The Battle of Flodden Field," a poem, &c.

WEBER, CARL MARIA TON, one of the most eminent of modern composers, was born in 1786, at Eutin, in Holstein, and was liberally educated. He made professional tours through various parts of Germany, and was successively chapel-master at Breslau and at Carlsruhe, and conductor of the opera at Prague. In 1816 he accepted an invitation to form a German opera at Dresden, and was appointed director of music to the court. His "Der Freischütz" was brought out in 1821 at Berlin, and rapidly attained a high degree of popularity throughout Europe. He visited London in 1826, and produced the opera of "Oberon;" but his health was greatly impaired, and he died on the 3d of June.

WEDGWOOD, JOSEPH, an ingenious improver of the English pottery manufacture, was born near Newcastle-under-Lyme, in 1730, and died in 1795. He not only exercised his ingenuity very beneficially in his particular trade, but he was versed in several branches of natural philosophy; invented the prometer; and was the projector of the Grand Trunk canal. He was public-spirited, enterprising, and benevolent.

WEEVER, JOHN, an English antiquary, was a native of Lancashire, and educated at Cambridge. He published a work of great curiosity and value, entitled "Funeral Monuments;" and died about 1632.

WEICKARD, MELCHIOR ADAM, an eminent German physician; a great advocate of the Brunonian system of medicine, and author of "The Philosophical Physician." Died, 1803.

WEIGEL, EHRAUD, an eminent mathematician and astronomer, of the 17th century. Died, 1699.

WEIGEL, CHRISTIAN EHRENFRIED, a German physician of the 18th century; distinguished for his chemical and botanical knowledge. He wrote "Observationes Botanicae," "Flora Pomerano-Rugica," &c.

WEINAR, BERNARD, duke of, a celebrated officer of the 17th century, who fought under Gustavus Adolphus, and was afterwards placed by Louis XIII. at the head of a powerful army, with which he drove the Imperialists out of Burgundy, and conquered Alsace. Died, 1639.

WEIMAR, ANNA AMELIA, duchess of, daughter of the duke of Brunswick, was born in 1700, and was distinguished by her talents, and the patronage she afforded to literature and the arts. The ruin of her family, and other miseries, produced by the French invasion of Germany, clouded her latter days. She died in 1807.

WEINBRENNER, FREDERIC, an eminent German architect, born at Carlsruhe, in 1706. After studying in Italy, and travelling over the continent for the purpose of examining works of art, he returned to his native country, and founded an institution for the study of painting, modelling, poetry, the fine arts, and archaeology; and from this school issued many distinguished artists. He erected several splendid edifices at Carlsruhe, Leipzig, and other places, and wrote treatises on different branches of science. Died, 1836.

WEISSE, CHRISTIAN FELIX, a German poet and dramatist, born at Annaberg, in Saxony, in 1726. He wrote the "Children's Friend," and many other popular works for the amusement and instruction of youth; besides songs, dramas, and poena. Died, 1804.

WELD, THOMAS, an English cardinal, was born in 1773, at Lulworth castle, Dorsetshire, and was the eldest son of Thomas Weld, esq. founder of the Roman Catholic college at Stonyhurst, in Lancashire. He succeeded to his ancestral estates in 1810; but, on the death of his wife, in 1813, he took orders, and was some years afterwards consecrated coadjutor bishop of Canada. Being in Italy with his daughter, lady De Clifford, in 1829, pope Pius VIII. elevated him to the dignity of a cardinal. For many years previous he had devoted the whole of his time, and a great part of his fortune, to pious and charitable purposes; and he now relinquished his estates to his brother, Joseph Weld, esq., who, in 1830, received Charles X. of France, and his family, as guests at Lulworth castle, previous to their removal to Holyrood-house. He died, April 10, 1837.

WELLS, EDWARD, a learned divine, was born at Corham, in Wiltshire, about 1665, and died in 1730. He published a valuable work on the "Geography of the Old and New Testament," 2 vols.; a "Course of Mathematics for Young Gentlemen," 3 vols.; and some other works.

WELSTED, LEONARD, an English poet, dramatist, and miscellaneous writer. Born, 1669; died, 1749.

WELLWOOD, THOMAS, a Scotch physician, was born near Edinburgh, in 1652, and died in 1716. He was the author of "Memoirs of English Affairs from 1688 to the Revolution."

WELLWOOD, SIR HENRY MONCKEIFF, bart., D.D., an eminent Scotch divine, was born at Blackford, near Stirling, in 1750. He was inducted at St. Cuthbert's Edinburgh, in 1775, and took an active part in the government of the Scottish church, of which he was an able and zealous pastor. Died, 1827.

WEPFER, JOHN JAMES, a Swiss physician and medical writer. Born, 1620; died, 1695.

WERKMEISTER, ANDREWS, an eminent German composer, and writer on music; author of "Musica Mathematica;" "Harmonologia Musica," &c. Born, 1645; died, 1706.

WERNER, JOHN, a geographer and astronomer, who in his day acquired a high reputation. Died, 1504.

WERNER, JOSEPH, an eminent Swiss painter, especially excelling in miniature. Born, 1637; died, 1710.

WERNER, PAUL DE, a celebrated Prussian general, born in 1707. He displayed great bravery at the head of his troops at the battles of Prague, Kollin, Breslau, &c., and in 1759 he drove general de Ville out of Silesia, and raised the siege of Colberg. He was afterwards taken prisoner by the Russians, and the most advantageous offers were made him by the czar Peter III. to induce him to enter into his service; but he rejected them, and, returning to Prussia, was again successfully employed in his country's service; and died in 1785.

WERNER, ABRAHAM GOTTLIEB, a celebrated German mineralogist, born in Upper Lusatia, in 1750. His treatise "On the external Characteristics of Fossils," procured him the professorship of mineralogy at Freyburg, where his lectures on geology and mineralogy were attended by students from various parts of Europe. He was also keeper of the cabinet of natural history, and counsellor of the mines in Saxony. His cabinet of minerals, consisting of one hundred thousand specimens, and which was unrivalled for complete-new and arrangement, he sold for 40,000 crowns, reserving the interest of 32,000 to revert at the death of his sister to the Mineralogical Academy of Freyburg. To him the science is highly indebted for its systematic arrangement; and he may, in fact, be considered the Linnæus of mineralogy. Died, 1817.

WERNER, FREDERIC LUDWIG ZACHARIAS, a German dramatist, born at Konigsberg, in 1768, and studied philosophy under Kant. In 1801 he published, at Berlin, "The Sons of the Valley," which was followed by "The Templars in Cyprus," and "The Brethren of the Cross." He was very eccentric in his thoughts and habits, and occupied himself with many romantic projects. At length, in 1811, he embraced the Catholic faith, studied theology, and was ordained a priest. He wrote several tragedies and religious pieces; and died in 1823.

WESLEY, SAMUEL, an English divine, was born in 1662, at Whitechurch, in Dorsetshire; was admitted a servitor of Exeter college, Oxford; and, on taking orders, obtained the living of South Ormesby, in Lincolnshire, and afterwards the rectories of Epworth and Wroote. He wrote a volume of poems, entitled "Maggot's;" "The Life of Christ," an heroic poem; "The History of the Old and New Testament, in verse," 3 vols. &c. Died, 1733.

WESLEY, SAMUEL, eldest son of the preceding, was born at Epworth, about 1692; was educated at Westminster and Christchurch, Oxford; became usher in Westminster school, and in 1732 was appointed master of the grammar-school at Tiverton, where he died in 1739. He was a rigid high-churchman, and wholly disapproved of the conduct of his brothers John and Charles. He was the author of "The Battle of the Sexes," and other poems.

WESLEY, JOHN, son of Samuel Wesley the elder, was born at Epworth, in 1703. In 1730, while at Oxford, he and his brother, with a few other students, formed themselves into a small society for the purpose of mutual edification in religious exercises. So singular an association excited considerable notice, and among other names bestowed upon the members, that of Methodists was applied to them. Mr. Wesley, with some others, went to Georgia, in America, in 1735, with a view of converting the Indians. After a stay there of two years, he returned to England, commenced itinerant preacher, and gathered many followers. The churches being shut against him, he built spacious meeting-houses in London, Bristol, and other places. For some time he was united with Mr. Whitefield; but differences arising, on account of the doctrine of election, they separated, and the methodists were denominated according to their respective leaders. Mr. Wesley was indefatigable in his labours, and almost continually engaged in travelling over England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland. His society, though consisting of many thousands, was well organized, and he preserved his influence over it to the last. He published some volumes of hymns, numerous sermons, political tracts, and controversial treatises. In Wesley's countenance, mildness and gravity were pleasingly blended, and in old age he appeared extremely venerable: in manner, he was social, polite, and conversable: in the pulpit, he was fluent, clear, and argumentative. The approach of old age did not in the least abate his zeal and diligence: he was almost perpetually travelling; and his religious services, setting aside his literary and controversial labours, were almost beyond calculation. He died, March 2, 1791, in the 88th year of his age.

WESLEY, CHARLES, younger brother of the preceding, a minister also among the Methodists, and of respectable talents as a scholar and a poet, born 1708; died, 1788.

WESLEY, SAMUEL, an eminent musician, was the younger son of the preceding Charles Wesley, and, consequently, nephew to the celebrated John Wesley, the founder of his sect. The musical precocity of Samuel Wesley was astonishing. When only three years old he could play and extemporize freely on the organ; and he became, by the time he had arrived at manhood, not only one of the most astonishing extemporaneous players in Europe, but a fine composer and an excellent classical scholar. In 1767, from an accidental fall, which had nearly proved fatal, Mr. Wesley so seriously injured his head, that for seven years after he remained in a low desponding state, and during the remainder of his life was subject to periodical attacks of nervous irritability. During his intervals of health he prosecuted the science of music with the utmost ardour; he composed many pieces, and was much engaged in public performances on the organ. His compositions are grave and masterly; his melodies sweet, varied, and novel. He possessed remarkable energy of mind, with a simplicity of character rarely united. Died, Oct. 11, 1837, aged 71.

WEST, RICHARD, an eminent lawyer, who, in 1718, was made chancellor of Ireland. Died, 1728.

WEST, THOMAS, a topographical writer, was born at Ulverston, in Lancashire, where he died, in 1774. He wrote "The History of Furness;" and "A Guide to the Lakes."

WEST, GILBERT, a poet and miscellaneous writer, born in 1708, was educated at Christchurch, Oxford. He obtained the offices of clerk to the privy council, and treasurer of Chelsea college; was the author of "Poems," and "Observations on the Resurrection;" and translated some of the Odes of Pindar. Died, 1736.

WEST, BENJAMIN, a celebrated painter, was born, in 1738, near Springfield, in Pennsylvania, of Quaker parents. After exercising his pencil in different parts of America, he went to Italy in 1760, and came to England in 1763. One of his earliest friends was Dr. Drummmond, archbishop of York, who introduced the young American artist to George III., by whose order he executed his picture of "The Departure of Regulus from Rome," and whose patronage he enjoyed above forty years. On the death of Sir Joshua Reynolds, in 1791, Mr. West was elected presdent of the Royal Academy, which chair he enjoyed, with the exception of a short interval, till his death, in 1830. His "Death of General Wolfe" was among the first of his productions that attracted public notice; and among his last and best were "Death on the Pale Horse," and "Christ healing the Sick."

WESTALL, RICHARD, an eminent draughtsman and designer, born in 1763, was apprenticed to an engraver in heraldry on silver, &c.; but his genius soared higher than this humble department of the arts; and having studied at the Royal Academy, in 1786 he commenced his splendid career, imparting to his water-colour paintings a brilliance and vigour before unknown. About this time he formed a friendly intercourse with Mr. (afterwards Sir Thomas) Lawrence, which continued through life. Mr. Westall produced many excellent historical paintings; but he is best known as the designer of Boydell's superb editions of Milton and Shakspeare, and as the illustrator of numerous other works. From the great facility with which his ready talent enabled him to produce book designs, he was led into a greater degree of mannerism than any of his contemporaries; but still he produced many beautiful specimens of his superior taste and judgment. Like his friend, Sir Thomas Lawrence, he was favoured by royal patronage: his last occupation being, in giving her present Majesty (then princess Victoria) lessons in drawing and painting. He died, aged 71, Dec. 4, 1836.

WESTON, WILLIAM, rector of Campden, in Gloucestershire, where he died in 1760, was the author of two very learned works, one entitled, "An Enquiry into the Rejection of the Christian Miracles by the Heathens;" the other, "Dissertations on some of the most remarkable Wonders of Antiquity."

WESTON, THOMAS, an eminent comic actor, who performed at the Haymarket and Covent-garden theatres. In "Jerry Sneak," "Abel Druggier," and characters of a similar stamp, he was very successful; but he ruined his health and prospects by dissipation; and died in distress, in 1776.

WESTON, STEPHEN, an eminent classical scholar and orientalist, was born at Exeter, in 1747; educated at Eton, and Exeter college, Oxford; obtained the living of Maubrad, Devon, in 1777, but resigned his ecclesiastical preferment in 1790, and thenceforth devoted himself wholly to literary pursuits. We can here find space for the enumeration of only a few of his works; among which may be mentioned, "A Specimen of the Conformity of the European Languages, particularly the English, with the Oriental Languages;" "Letters from Paris," 2 vols.; "Specimen of a Chinese Dictionary;" besides various translations from the Chinese and Persian, in prose and poetry; Sermons, Tales, and works relative to philology, divinity, and antiquities. Died, 1830.

WETSTEIN, JOHN JAMES, a learned theologian, was born in 1693, at Basil, (where several others of his family also distinguished themselves by their acquirements).

He devoted himself, with great ardour and perseverance, to the restoration of the purity of the text of the New Testament; and, after collating the various Greek manuscripts which he met with in his travels and researches, came to the conclusion "that a variety of readings were no objection to the general authenticity of the text." In support of this opinion, he published his "Prolegomena ad Nov. Test. Græci editionem accuratissimam à vetustis. simis Codd. MSS. denuo procurandam." Died, 1754.

WEWITZER, RALPH, a comic actor, distinguished for his wit and powers of repartee, was a native of London, and originally a Jeweller; but the admirable manner in which he personated Jews, Frenchmen, &c., proved that, in venturing on the stage, he had not mistaken his forte. He died, a pensioner on the Theatrical Fund, in 1824, aged 76.

WHALLEY, PETER, a native of Rugby, in Warwickshire, was born in 1722; was educated at St. John's college, Oxford; became head master of the grammar-school attached to Christ's hospital, and was rector of St. Margaret Patern, London. He was the author of an "Essay on writing History," an "Inquiry into the Learning of Shakspeare," &c. Died, 1791.

WHARTON, HENRY, an English divine, antiquary, and historian, was born in 1661, at Worsled, in Norfolk. He was author of "Anglia Sacra," 2 vols.; and various other works.

WHARTON, THOMAS, marquis of, was born in 1640; sat in several parliaments during the reigns of Charles and James II., in which he strenuously opposed the court; and at the revolution he was made a privy councillor. Being a zealous Whig, and a firm supporter of the Hanoverian succession, he was raised to the rank of a marquis by George I. Died, 1716.

WHARTON, PHILIP, duke of, son of the preceding, was born in 1669, and very early gave signs of those talents which he afterwards displayed in a manner that more disgraced than honoured their possessor. After having, during his travels, accepted the title of duke from the Pretender, he returned to England, and evinced the versatility of his political principles, by becoming a warm champion of the existing government. Having impoverished himself by extravagance, he again changed his politics, and, retiring to the continent, intrigued with the Stuarts. He died in indigence, in Spain, 1731. His poems, letters, and miscellaneous pieces, form 2 vols.

WHEATLEY, CHARLES, a divine of the church of England, and author of a "Rational Illustration of the Common Prayer." Died, 1742.

WHEATLEY, FRANCIS, a painter of some eminence, born in London, in 1747; died, 1801. He was a self-instructed artist, attained celebrity as a portrait painter, and excelled in the representation of rural scenes.

WHELER, or WHEELER, Sir GEORGE, a divine and traveller, was born in 1680, at Charing, in Kent; was educated at Lin-coin hall, Oxford; travelled into Greece and Asia Minor; became a prebendary of Durham, vicar of Basingstoke, and rector of Houghton-le-Spring; and died in 1722-4. Besides his "Journey into Greece," a valuable and authentic work, he wrote "The Protestant Monastery," and "An Account of the Churches of the Primitive Christians." He built a chapel on his estate in Spitalfields, which still bears his name.

WHISTON, WILLIAM, a learned divine and mathematician, was born at Norton, in Leicestershire, in 1667. He studied at Clare-hall, Cambridge, was chosen a fellow of his college, and entered into holy orders. In 1703, he succeeded Sir Isaac Newton as professor of mathematics; but having conceived doubts concerning the doctrine of the Trinity, and at length adopted Arian opinions, he was expelled from the university in 1710, and deprived of his office. He then removed to the metropolis, and gave lectures on astronomy; but was prosecuted as a heretic, though the proceedings were ultimately terminated by an act of grace in 1715. Being refused admission to the sacrament at his parish church, he opened his own house for public worship, using a liturgy of his own composition; and towards the close of his life he became a baptist. Having subsequently distinguished himself by an abortive attempt to discover the longitude, and by his professed opinions relative to an approaching millennium, and the restoration of the Jews, he died in 1732. His principal works are, "A New Theory of the Earth, from its Original to the Consummation of all Things;" "Prælectiones Astronomicæ;" "Prælectiones Physico-Mathematicæ;" "The Works of Josephus," 4 vols.; and "Memoirs of his own Life," 3 vols.

WHITAKER, JOHN, an eminent divine and historian, was born at Manchester, in 1733; and died, rector of Ruan Lanyhorne, Cornwall, in 1808. Among his numerous works are, "A History of Manchester;" "A Vindication of Mary, Queen of Scots," 3 vols.; "The Course of Hannibal over the Alps," 2 vols.; and "The Origin of Government."

WHITAKER, EDWARD, was born in 1730; studied at Christchurch college, Oxford; obtained the livings of St. Mildred's, and All Saints, Canterbury; afterwards kept an academy at Egham, in Surrey; and, not long before his death, he was very instrumental in establishing that useful institution, "The Refuge for the Destitute." His principal works are, "A general and connected View of the Prophecies;" "Family Sermons," 3 vols.; and "An Abridgment of Universal History," 2 vols. 4to.

WHITBREAD, SAMUEL, a distinguished member of the House of Commons, was the son of the eminent brewer in Chiswell-street, London, and born in 1738. He represented Bedford in parliament many years, and was one of the most vigorous opponents of Mr. Pitt. He also conducted the impeachment of Lord Melville; and was uniformly in opposition to the government. In a fit of insanity, supposed to be occasioned by his over-anxious attention to business, and particularly to the intricate concerns of Drury-lane theatre, with which he was connected, he destroyed himself in 1813.

WHITE, or WHYTE, JOHN, bishop of Winchester, born at Farnham, in Surrey, in 1511. In the reign of Edward VI. he was sent to the Tower for opposing the reformation, but queen Mary released him, and made him a bishop. Died, 1564.

WHITE, SIR THOMAS, founder of St. John's college, Oxford, was born at Reading, in 1492; became an opulent London tradesman; and in 1543 he served the office of lord mayor, and received the honour of knighthood for preserving the peace of the city during Wyatt's rebellion. He died in 1566.

WHITE, JOHN, usually styled the "patriarch of Dorchester," was highly esteemed for his preaching and sanctity. Born, 1574; died, 1648.

WHITE, THOMAS, an English philosopher of the 17th century, chiefly known as the friend and correspondent of Hobbes and Descartes. Died, 1696.

WHITE, JEREMY, a nonconformist minister, who wrote a remarkable book on the "Restoration of all Things," in which he maintained the doctrine of universal redemption. Died, 1707.

WHITE, GILBERT, a divine and naturalist, was born at Selborne, in Hampshire, in 1730. He resided on his paternal estate in his native village, devoting his leisure to literature and the study of nature; and the fruit of his researches appeared in "The Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne." Died, 1783.

WHITE, JAMES, a miscellaneous writer, was a native of Ireland, and was educated at the university of Dublin. He was the author of "Conway Castle, and other Poems;" "Earl Strongbow, a romance;" "Adventures of John of Ganot," 3 vols.; "Richard Cœur de Lion," 3 vols. &c. &c. Died, 1790.

WHITE, HENRY KIRKE, a youthful poet of great promise, was born at Nottingham, in 1785, and from his infancy manifested an extraordinary love of learning. He was first placed with a stocking-weaver, from which business he was removed to the office of an attorney, where he devoted all his spare time to the acquirement of Latin and Greek; and at length, through the generosity of Mr. Wilberforce, he was admitted a student of St. John's college, Cambridge. There he applied himself to his studies with such unremitting labour, that his constitution sunk under the effort, and he died in 1806. The "Remains of Henry Kirke White," consisting of poems, letters and fragments, have been edited by Southey.

WHITE, JOSEPH, an eminent divine and orientalist, was born at Stroud, in Gloucestershire, in 1748; was educated at Wadham college, Oxford; and was elected Laudian professor of Arabic, in 1775. Having in 1761, as Bampton lecturer, delivered a set of sermons on the evidences of Christianity, which were highly approved of, he was presented to a prebend at Gloucester, and took the degree of D.D.; though it afterwards appeared he was much indebted to Mr. Badcock and Dr. Parr in the composition of them. In 1800 he published his "Dissertation," or a Harmony of the Gospels, in Latin, which was followed by his "Egyptians; or, Observations on certain Antiquities of Egypt;" "Griesbach's Greek Testament," &c. Died, 1814.

WHITE, the Rev. HENRY, a clergyman of the church of England, long known as one of the most eminent literary characters of Lichfield, and who, in his younger days, was the acquaintance and friend of Miss Seward and Dr. Johnson. Died, 1836.

WHITEHEAD, GEORGE, a Quaker, born at Orton, in Westmoreland, in 1636. He endured with patience much persecution for his zealous attempts at proselytism; but he continued to persevere; and after the Revolution, he procured for the members of his sect the legal allowance of an affirmation instead of an oath. Died, 1723.

WHITEHEAD, PAUL, author of the satires, entitled "The State Dunces," "The Gymnasium," and "Manners." He was deputy-treasurer of the exchequer chamber. Died, 1774.

WHITEHEAD, JOHN, a physician and Methodist preacher, who attended Mr. John Wesley in his last illness, preached his funeral sermon, and published "Memoirs of his Life," 2 vols. Died, 1804.

WHITEHEAD, WILLIAM, a poet, was born at Cambridge, in 1715; was educated at Winchester school, and Clare-hall; and succeeded Cibber as poet laureate. He wrote the tragedies of "The Roman Father," and "Cæsus;" the comedy of "The School for Lovers;" several elegant poems, &c. Died, 1784.

WHITEFIELD, or WHITFIELD, Geo., founder of the Calvinistic Methodists, was born in 1714, at Gloucester, where his father kept the Bell inn. While at Pembroke college, Oxford, he joined the Wesleys and their associates; and on being ordained deacon, he soon became a popular preacher. In 1736 he went to Georgia, where his conduct gave great satisfaction to the colonists; and he returned to England to procure subscriptions for building an orphan-house in that settlement. On obtaining priest's orders, and repairing to London, the churches in which he preached were incapable of holding the assembled crowd; he therefore adopted the design of preaching in the open air, which he did to vast assemblages of people, who came from all parts to hear him. In 1739 he again embarked for America, and made a tour through several of the provinces, where he preached to immense audiences, and returned to England in 1741. After visiting many parts of England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, and displaying a degree of intrepidity and zeal that overcame all difficulties, he made a seventh voyage to America, and died at Newbury-port, in New England, Sept. 30, 1770.

WHITEHURST, JOHN, an ingenious mechanic, born at Congleton, in Cheshire, in 1713; was distinguished by his superior construction of hydraulic machines, thermometers, barometers, &c. Died, 1788.

WHITELOCK, BULSTRODE, an eminent lawyer and statesman, born in 1605. He was chairman of the committee for drawing up the charges against the earl of Strafford; but though he adhered steadfastly to the republicans, he rendered various services to learning and religion during that dreadful period, and took no part in the proceedings against Charles I. Died, 1676.

WHITGIFT, JOHN, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Great Grimsby, in Lincolnshire, in 1533; and having been gradually advanced to the primacy, succeeded to Grindal, in 1583, he filled the situation with orthodox firmness, and was regarded both by Catholics and puritans as a persecutor. Died, 1603.

WHITLOCK, ELIZABETH, a sister of the Messrs. Kemble and Mrs. Siddons, was born in 1781. Allured by the success of her sister, she chose the histrionic art, and after a little practice in the country, made her first appearance at Drury-lane theatre in 1783—the same year that John and Stephen made their débuts in London. In 1785 she married Mr. Whitlock, manager of the Newcastle theatre, and in 1792 she accompanied her husband to America, where, in 1799, he died. Though far excelled by her sister, whom she greatly resembled in person, she was a good tragic actress, and realized a fortune by her profession. Died, 1836.

WHITTINGHAM, WILLIAM, a divine, who in the reign of Elizabeth was dean of Durham, in which cathedral he committed sad outrages, by mutilating or removing the statues, monuments, and other ancient remains, under an idea that they savoured of popery. Died, 1579.

WHITTINGTON, Sir RICHARD, a citizen and mercer, and "thrice lord mayor of London," was an extensive benefactor to the metropolis, though the marvellous stories connected with his name are groundless fictions. His almshouses, for thirteen poor men, form an interesting object on Highgate hill, and near them stands the famous stone which commemorates his return to London at the time the church bells so invitingly recalled him, in tones which he was fain to believe assured him of future civic honours. His last majority was in 1419.

WHITWORTH, CHARLES, earl, an able diplomatist, was born in 1734, at Seaburne Grange, in Kent, and was educated at Tunbridge school. He was ambassador to Poland in 1786, and to Russia in 1788, at which court he resided twelve years. In 1801 he negotiated a treaty with Denmark; was sent as plenipotentiary to Paris in 1802; went to Ireland as viceroy in 1814; and died in 1825.

WICKLIFF, or WYCLIFFE, JOHN, an English divine of the 14th century, who has received the appellation of "the Morning Star of the Reformation," was born about 1324, at a parish in Yorkshire, whence he takes his name. He studied at Oxford; and was the first who opposed the authority of the pope, the jurisdiction of the bishops, and the temporalities of the church. Wickliff also translated the Scriptures, and in 1381 he ventured to attack the doctrine of transubstantiation, in a piece entitled "De Blasphemis," which being condemned at Oxford, he went thither and made a declaration of his faith, professing his resolution to defend it with his blood. Died, 1384.

WIELAND, CHRISTOPHER MARTIN, an eminent German novelist, and essayist, was born in 1733, at Biberach, in Suabia. His works form 48 vols., and are too multifarious to enumerate; they include histories, tales, poems, essays, and numerous translations; among the latter, are the works of Shakespeare. Died, 1813.

WIFFEN, JEREMIAH HOLME, a celebrated Quaker poet, was born in 1792, and brought up to the profession of a school-master, in which he was for some years engaged. The work on which his political fame mainly rests, is a translation of Tasso, in which he adopted the Spenserian stanza; but he wrote many other works, and was a contributor of poetry to some of the most popular Annuals. Among his productions we must name "Aonian Hours, and other Poems;" also, a translation of poems from the Spanish of De la Vega; a series of stanzas illustrative of the portraits at Woburn Abbey, entitled "The Russels;" and his able prose work, "The History of the Russel Family," which he traces up to the heathen chiefs three centuries before the time of the conquering Rollo. With a liberality befitting his wealth and station, the duke of Bedford appointed him to the situation of private secretary and librarian; and, under the patronage of his Grace, surrounded as he was by rare books, paintings, sculpture, and objects of veritas, he spent his hours in an enviable state of mental luxury; for he was not a mere bookworm, but had a taste for the fine arts generally, and, while he was an admirer of all that is good in morals, he well appreciated whatever was beautiful in creation. He died in 1836. His sister is the wife of Mr. Alaric Watts, both poets, and well known in the literary world.

WILBERFORCE, WILLIAM, a distinguished philanthropist, was born in 1759, at Hull. He completed his education at Cambridge, and there obtained the friendship of Mr. Pitt. He was elected M.P. for Hull directly he was of age. The next year (1787), he distinguished himself by his famous motion for the abolition of Negro slavery, which after a long warfare, and many struggles, was finally decreed by the British legislature in 1807. Mr. Wilberforce approved the principles of the French revolution, as they exhibited themselves at its commencement; and, on the motion of M. Brissot, in August, 1792, was voted the right of French citizenship. But, in 1801, sympathizing with the growing claims of the court and the country, at the excesses of the French revolutionists, he denounced the designs of Buonaparte, and supported all the ministerial measures of vigorous opposition to France. In his exertions to emancipate the hapless African from the chains of slavery, Mr. Wilberforce never relaxed. He published a "Practical View of the prevailing religious Systems of Professed Christians," and an "Apology for the Christian Sabbath." Died, aged 73, in 1833.

WILCOCKS, JOSEPH, a philanthropist and ingenious writer, was the son of the bishop of Rochester, and born in 1723. He was the author of "Rome Conversations," 2 vols., and "Sacred Exercises." Died, 1791.

WILD, HENRY, a tailor of Norwich, who made himself master of the Hebrew, Arabic, and other Oriental languages; and was drawn from obscurity by Dr. Pridenax, who procured him a place in the Bodleian library. He translated from the Arabic, "Mahomet's Journey to Heaven." Born, 1684; died, 1731.

WILDBORE, CHARLES, an ingenious mathematician, who was entirely self-taught both in his favourite science, and in the languages. Died, 1802.

WILFORD, FRANCIS, an eminent Orientalist, was a native of Hanover, and went to India in 1781, as an officer with the foreign troops sent there by the British government. He became one of the first members of the Asiatic society of Calcutta, and published many valuable memoirs on the history and antiquities of Hindostan, in the Asiatic Researches. Died, 1822.

WILKES, JOHN, an alderman of London, distinguished for the violence of his political conduct, was born in the metropolis, in 1727. He received a liberal education; and after travelling on the continent, married a lady of fortune, and became a colonel of the Buckinghamshire militia. In 1764 he was elected M.P. for Aylesbury; but on publishing an offensive libel in No. 45 of his periodical paper, the "North Briton," a general warrant was issued by the secretary of state to seize him and his papers, and he was committed to the Tower. In a few days after, however, he was brought, by writ of habeas corpus, before chief justice Pratt of the Common Pleas, who decided that general warrants were illegal, and he was consequently discharged, amidst the general rejoicings of the populace. In the meantime, Wilkes incurred another prosecution for printing an obscene poem, called an "Essay on Woman;" and for not appearing to receive judgment, was outlawed. He then went to France, where he resided till 1768, when he was elected for Middlesex; but was prevented from taking his seat, and committed to the King's Bench prison, which occasioned dreadful riots in St. George's Fields. He had now attained the height of his popularity; a large subscription was entered into to pay his debts; and in 1774, the year of his mayoralty, he was again elected for Middlesex, and permitted to take his seat without further opposition. He died in 1797.

WILKINS, SIR CHARLES, F.R.S., &c., an eminent oriental scholar, was a native of Somersetshire. He went to Bengal, in the civil service, in 1770. While thus employed, he directed his attention to the study of the Sanscrit language, and followed it up with such perseverance, that he translated the "Bhagavad Gita" into English, which Warren Hastings, then governor-general, presented to the court of directors, and prefixed to it an elegant dissertation. Mr. Wilkins also possessed great mechanical ingenuity, and prepared with his own hands the first Bengali and Persian types employed in Bengal. After residing fifteen years in India he returned, but continued to pursue his oriental studies, and published a translation of the "Hitopadesa, or the Fables of Vishnuo Sarma;" and in 1800 he was made librarian of the valuable collection of MSS. which the court of directors possessed through the conquest of Serangapatam. He was also appointed visitor in the oriental department for the company's colleges at Haileybury and Addiscombe. In 1808 Sir Charles produced his excellent "Sanskrit Grammar;" he also edited and enlarged Richardson's Dictionary of the Persian and Arabic languages, in 2 vols. 4to. He was a member of the French Institute; admitted to the honorary degree of D.C.L. in the university of Oxford, and was a knight of the Guelphic order. Born, 1751; died, 1836.

WILLDENOW, CHARLES LOUIS, a celebrated botanist, born at Berlin, in 1765. After having filled the professorial chair, he was made director of the botanic garden at Berlin, which he vastly improved, and also presented to the museum, a zoological cabinet of his formation. In 1811 he was invited to Paris by Humboldt, to classify and describe the multitude of new plants brought by that traveller from America. Among his principal works are, "Prodromus Floræ Berolinensis;" "Eléments de Botanique;" and "Species Plantarum," which was not quite completed when he died, in 1812.

WILKIE, WILLIAM, a Scotch poet: author of "The Epigoniad." Born, 1721; died, 1772.

WILKINS, DAVID, a learned divine, born in 1665, who became archdeacon of Suffolk, and published "Leges Saxonice;" "Concilia Magnæ Britannie," 4 vols., &c. Died, 1745.

WILKINS, JOHN, bishop of Chester in the 17th century, was born in 1614, at Fawley, in Northamptonshire, and educated at Oxford. He married Oliver Cromwell's sister, and was appointed warden of Wadham college, and master of Trinity college; and though he was deprived of these preferments at the Restoration, he afterwards found favour in the sight of Charles II., and, in 1668, was raised to the bishopric of Chester. He was the founder of that association which afterwards became the Royal Society; produced several mathematical and theological works; and died in 1672.

WILLIAM I., king of England, surnamed the Conqueror, was the natural son of Robert I. duke of Normandy, and of Ariotta, the daughter of a tanner at Falaise, where he was born in 1024. He reigned as duke of Normandy till the death of Edward the Confessor, when, pretending that the crown had been bequeathed to him by that monarch, he fitted out a large expedition, and landed on the coast of Sussex. As soon as the troops were disembarked, he burnt the vessels, exclaiming, "See your country." Harold opposed him, but was defeated and slain at Hastings; after which William marched to London, and was crowned at Westminster on Christmas-day, 1065. His first measures were mild and judicious; but during his absence in Normandy, the English being treated like a conquered people, showed a disposition to rebel; upon which he adopted the feudal system with all its injustice and severity; dividing the land into baronies, expelling the rightful owners from their possessions, and giving them and the church dignities to foreigners. He also introduced the Norman language, and ordered that all law pleadings and statutes should be in that tongue; and, in order to prevent nightly meetings and conspiracies, he instituted the curfew, or "cover fire bell." To gratify his passion for the chase, he laid waste the New Forest in Hampshire, where he demolished villages, churches, and convents, and expelled the inhabitants for thirty miles round. In 1078 he finished the Tower of London. In 1087 he invaded France, where he committed great ravages, and was about to march to Paris, but died in consequence of a fall from his horse, and was buried in the abbey of St. Gervais, near Rouen.

WILLIAM II. surnamed RUFUS, from his red hair, was the second son of the Conqueror, and was born in 1060. He succeeded to the English throne on the death of his father in 1087; bought the dukedom of Normandy of his brother Robert, who joined the crusaders; and, after an unequal reign of nearly thirteen years, he was accidentally killed while hunting in the New Forest; an arrow, shot by a French gentleman, named Walter Tyrrel, having glanced from a tree, and pierced his heart. This event took place, August 2, 1100. He is described as having been cruel, perfidious, and rapacious in a high degree. The Tower of London, London Bridge, and Westminster Hall, were built in his reign.

WILLIAM III. of Nassau, prince of Orange, and king of England, was born at the Hague, in 1650. He was the son of William, prince of Orange, and of Henrietta Maria, daughter of Charles I. He married the princess Mary, daughter of James I. duke of York; and succeeded to the stadtholdership in 1672. In 1688, the arbitrary measures of James II. induced many disaffected nobles and others to invite over the prince of Orange; who gladly embraced the occasion, and landed, without opposition, in Torbay, Nov. 5, the same year, and was crowned April 11, 1689. The year following William went to Ireland, where he defeated James at the battle of the Boyne. In 1691 he headed the confederated army in the Netherlands; took Namur in 1695; and in 1697 he was acknowledged king of England by the treaty of Ry-swijk. On the death of Mary, in 1693, the parliament confirmed to him the royal title. His death, which occurred March 8, 1703, was accelerated by an injury he had sustained in a fall from his horse.

WILLIAM IV. king of England, known before his accession to the throne as WILLIAM HENRY, duke of Clarence, was the third son of George III., and was born August the 21st, 1765. At fourteen years of age, he entered the navy as a midshipman on board the Prince George, a 98 gun ship, commanded by admiral Digby; and, at the king's especial desire, he was placed on the same footing, in every respect, with other youths of the same rank in the service. Within twelve months of his having been at sea, prince William Henry had the good fortune to be present with admiral Rodney at the capture of the Caracas fleet, commanded by Don Juan Langara. When the Spanish admiral was brought on board the Prince George as a prisoner, and was told that one of the anti-slavers, whom he saw actively engaged in his duty, was an English prince of the blood, he exclaimed: "Well may England be mistress of the sea, when the son of her king is thus employed in her service!" The prince served nearly all the residue of his time as a midshipman in the West Indies, and off the coast of Nova Scotia and Canada; and many characteristic anecdotes, honourable to his bravery and humanity, are related of him during this period of his naval career. He was afterwards removed to the Warwick of 80 guns, commanded by lord Keith, and was present when that officer captured the frigates L'Aigle and La Soieble, and the Terrier sloop-of-war, off the Delaware, in 1782. He then joined lord Hood, who was in quest of the French fleet, under Vaudreuil, and first became acquainted with Nelson on board the Barclay. In June, 1783, lord Hood's squadron returned to England; and in the summer of 1784, the prince, having served the regular time as a midshipman, was appointed third lieutenant of the Hebe frigate. In 1786, as captain of the Pegasus of 28 guns, he sailed for Nova Scotia; whence he proceeded to the Leeward Islands station, and remained for some months under the orders of Nelson, then captain of the Boreas frigate; when a strong and lasting friendship (honourable to both) sprang up between them. In December, 1787, the prince returned to England, and was appointed to command the Andromeda frigate, in which he again sailed for the West Indies. On his arrival at Port Royal he received the congratulations of the House of Assembly, who voted a thousand guineas for a diamond star to be presented to him, as a mark of the high sense they entertained of his conduct while formerly on that station. In 1789, he was created duke of Clarence, and earl of Munster in Ireland; took his seat in the House of Lords; and was made rear-admiral of the blue in 1790. From the time, however, he received his flag, the duke of Clarence saw no more active service abroad, though he repeatedly expressed his most anxious wishes to be employed. In 1811 he succeeded Sir Peter Parker as admiral of the fleet. In that capacity he hoisted his flag for the last time, for the purpose of escorting Louis XVIII. to France; and on board the Invincible he received the emperor of Russia and the king of Prussia, with their splendid cortege. For many years the duke lived the life of a private English gentleman, residing at Bushy Park, of which he had been appointed ranger, on the death of the countess of Guildford, in 1797. [His connexion with Mrs. Jordan has been given at sufficient length in our biographical memoir of that lady.] After the death of the princess Charlotte of Wales, in 1817, a new era took place in the position and prospects of the duke of Clarence; and on the 11th of July, 1818, he married the princess Adelaide-Louise-Therese-Caroline-Amalia, the eldest daughter of the duke of Saxe-Coburg-Meiningen. Two female children, the eldest of which died on the day of her birth, and the youngest when only three months old, were their only offspring. Having become heir-presumptive to the throne, in 1827, by the death of the duke of York, his Royal Highness received an additional parliamentary grant, which raised his income to 40,000*l.* a-year. He was also appointed lord high admiral of England—a post revived for the occasion, after having been in abeyance just one hundred years. In which important station he was highly popular; but owing to some objections made by the duke of Wellington, (who, with his colleagues, came into office on the death of Mr. Canning) to the expenses of his Royal Highness's progresses, he resigned the office. On the 26th of June, 1830, the duke of Clarence succeeded his brother, George IV., as king of England, and was crowned, with his royal consort, in Westminster Abbey, September the 8th, 1831. A marked difference was soon observable in the conduct of William IV. and his predecessor. The secluded habits and fastidious retirement that had distinguished the last years of his brother's life, gave place to an obvious desire of popularity on the part of the new monarch; while the Wellington administration was succeeded by that of earl Grey, under whom the Reform of Parliament was effected. Political animosities were at their height; but still the king was on the popular side, and the court offered, in every respect, an example worthy of imitation. In May, 1837, his Majesty was taken ill, and in four weeks from that time, June 29, 1837, "he died in a gentle sleep, his head resting upon the queen's shoulder, and her Majesty supporting his breast—a position which the queen had maintained about an hour before her royal husband's death, and, indeed, during nearly all the King's hours of sleep, for the last fortnight of his Majesty's illness." Sincere and honourable were the eulogiums pronounced upon him at his death by men of all parties; and perhaps we could not paint his true character as more justly than in the brief and expressive language of lord Grey:—"A man more sincerely devoted to the interests of his country, and better understanding what was necessary for the attainment of that object, there never did exist; and if ever there was a sovereign entitled to the character, his majesty may truly be styled a PATRIOT KING!" After lying in state the usual time, the remains of William IV. were interred, with all the customary regal solemnities, in St. George's chapel, Windsor; and as the royal corpse was deposited, the herald concluded the mournful rites in "humbly beseeching Almighty God to bless and preserve with long life, health, and happiness, and all worldly happiness, our Sovereign Lady, VICTORIA, now, by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen!"

WILLIAMS, JOHN, archbishop of York, and lord keeper under James I.: an eminent theological writer. Born, 1582; died, 1640.

WILLIAMS, GRIFFITH, bishop of Osnory, was born in Wales, in 1589; became chaplain to the king, prebendary of Westminster, and then dean of Bangor. In 1641, he was advanced to the see of Osnory, but the rebellion breaking out the same year, he was obliged to fly to England. He suffered much for his loyalty; but at the restoration recovered his bishopric, and died at Kilkenny, in 1679. He wrote "Seven Golden Candlesticks, holding the Seven Lights of Christian Religion," and other works of a similar character.

WILLIAMS, JOHN, an English prelate, born in 1634; became chaplain to William and Mary, who gave him a prebend at Canterbury, and in 1696, promoted him to the bishopric of Chichester. He died in 1709.

WILLIAMS, DANIEL, a presbyterian minister, was born at Wrexham, in Denbighshire, in 1644, and died in 1716. He founded the library in Redcross-street for dissenting ministers.

WILLIAMS, Sir CHARLES HANBURY, an English statesman and poet, was born in 1709; represented the borough of Monmouth in several parliaments; was ambassador to Berlin in 1744, and afterwards to St. Petersburg; and wrote various poems, which are more remarkable for their ease and vivacity, than for their moral tendency. Died, 1759.

WILLIAMS, ANNA, a poet and miscellaneous writer, who having lost her sight by a cataract, was received under the hospitable roof of Dr. Johnson, where she died in 1783, aged 77.

WILLIAMS, HELEN MARIA, a modern writer on history, politics, and general literature, was born in the north of England, in 1762, and was introduced to the public notice by Dr. Kippax. In 1790, she settled at Paris; and soon after appeared her "Letters from France," the object of which was to recommend the doctrines of the Girondists; and consequently on their fall, she was arrested, imprisoned, and nearly shared their fate. Besides her poems, and many works of minor importance, she engaged in an English translation of the "Personal Narrative of the Travels of Humboldt and Bonpland in America," 6 vols.; she also wrote a "Narrative of Events in France in 1815," &c. Died, 1827.

WILLIAMS, DAVID, a miscellaneous writer, was born in 1739, in Cardiganshire; became a dissenting minister; but, adopting the deist's creed, he opened a chapel, near Cavendish-square, for the diffusion of his new opinions. In a short time, however, this temple of infidelity was deserted; and the preacher had recourse to private teaching and literary speculations. It is worthy of record, that Mr. Williams was the founder of the Literary Fund Society, and that at the close of his life he was himself an object of the bounty of that excellent institution. His chief works are, "Lectures on Education," 3 vols.; "Lectures on Political Principles;" a "History of Monmouthshire," 2 vols. 4to.; and "Lectures on the Principles and Duties of Religion and Morality." Died, 1816.

WILLIAMSON, Sir JOSEPH, a statesman, was born about 1630, at Bridekirk, in Cumberland. In 1674 he became principal secretary of state; but, in 1764, he was sent to the Tower, for granting commissions to popish recusants. The king, however, released him the same day; and Sir Joseph resigned his place soon after. He died in 1701; leaving a valuable collection of manuscripts, with 6000*l.*, to the college where he had been educated; he also founded a mathematical school at Rochester.

WILLIAMSON, HUGH, an American physician, was born in Pennsylvania, in 1733, and received his education at the college of Philadelphia; but relinquished the clerical profession, for which he had been intended, and turned his attention first to mathematics, and subsequently to medicine. After visiting Edinburgh and Leyden, at which latter university he obtained the degree of M.D., he returned and practised in Philadelphia. He was one of the committee appointed by the American Philosophical Society, 1789, to observe the transit of Venus over the solar disc; and he attracted considerable attention by his observations on the remarkable comet which then made its appearance, as he came to the conclusion that comets, instead of being ignited masses, are inhabited planets. He was appointed to the medical staff of the revolutionary army; and at the restoration of peace, he became a member of congress. Among his chief works are, "The History of North Carolina," 2 vols.; and "Observations on the Climate of America." Died, 1819.

WILLIS, THOMAS, one of the most celebrated physicians of his time, was born at Great Bedwin, Wilts, in 1621, and died in Westminster, in 1673. His medical and philosophical works have been printed in two volumes.

WILLIS, Dr. BROWNE, an English antiquary, who made and published a "Survey of the Cathedrals of England," and wrote other works. He was born at Blandford, in Dorsetshire, in 1682; died, 1760.

WILLIS, FRANCIS, a celebrated physician, distinguished for his skill in the treatment of mental disorders, was a native of Lincolnshire, and received his education in Brasenose college, Oxford, of which he became a fellow. He took the degree of M.A. in 1740, entered into holy orders, and obtained the living of St. John's, Wapping. He then studied medicine, and, devoting his attention to maniacal diseases, established a private asylum for lunatics at Greatford, in Lincolnshire. The anomaly of a clergyman keeping a madhouse being sharply animadverted upon by the faculty, he proceeded to take his degrees, and properly qualified himself as a physician. When George III. was seized with the mania which for a time suspended the royal functions, Dr. Willis was called in, and, in opposition to the other physicians, pronounced it to be his decided opinion, that his majesty would recover. The doctor was in consequence entrusted with the principal care of the royal person; and the result confirmed the accuracy of his judgment. His success was rewarded with a handsome gratuity from parliament, and a vast accession of professional practice very naturally flowed in upon him. He died in 1807.—His son, Dr. ROBERT DARLINO WILLIS, was in 1811 appointed one of the royal physicians in ordinary.

WILLOUGHBY, FRANCIS, a celebrated naturalist, born in 1633. He paid particular attention to ornithology and ichthyology, and formed a rich museum of animal and fossil productions. He was the friend of Ray, who arranged and published his works after his decease. Died, 1672.

WILMOT, JOHN EARDLEY, a learned judge, was born at Derby, in 1700; and, passing through the ordinary legal promotions, became chief justice of the Common Pleas in 1776. Died, 1792. His "Notes of Opinions" were published in 1809.—His son, JOHN WILMOT EARDLEY, born at Derby, in 1748, was an eminent chancery lawyer, and died in 1815. He wrote "A Treatise on the Laws and Customs of England;" "Memoirs of his Father;" "Life and Letters of Bishop Hough," &c.

WILSON, FLORENCE, a Scotch writer, was born at Elgin, in Scotland, in 1500, and was educated at King's college, Aberdeen. He went to Paris, and taught philosophy in the college of Navarre, but returned to his native country, where he died in 1557. He wrote a treatise "De Tranquillitate Animæ."

WILSON, ARTHUR, an historian, was secretary to Robert, earl of Essex, and afterwards steward to the earl of Warwick. He wrote a pedantic and partial history of the "Life and Reign of James I." Died, 1642.

WILSON, RICHARD, an eminent English landscape painter, was born in 1714, in Montgomerieshire. He began his career as a portrait-painter, which line he quitted, by the advice of Zuccarelli, and went to Italy, where he studied landscape painting with a success that obtained for him the appellation of the English Claude. The first picture he exhibited was Niohe; and in 1768 he produced a view of Rome. Although whatever came from his easel bore the stamp of elegance and truth, yet during the latter part of his life he was doomed to undergo neglect; and he was reduced to solicit the office of librarian to the Royal Academy, of which at its establishment he had been chosen one of the first members. Died, 1782.

WILSON. THOMAS, bishop of Sodor and Man, an excellent prelate, and eminent writer in theology. Born, 1683; died, 1735. His works consist of "Religious Tracts," and "Sermons," with a short "History of the Isle of Man."

WILSON, THOMAS, son of the bishop, born in 1742, was rector of St. Stephen's, Walbrook forty-six years, and published a work entitled "The Ordinaments of Churches considered." Died, 1784. His warm patronage of, and ridiculous attachment to, the celebrated female historian, Catherine Macauley, to whom, while living, he erected a statue in his church, is well known.

WILSON, ALEXANDER, a celebrated ornithologist, was born at Paisley, in 1768. He was brought up as a weaver; but his poetical disposition, and relish for the quiet and sequestered beauties of nature, prompting to assume almost the character of a passion, he gave utterance to his feelings in verse; and he longed for an opportunity to disenthral himself from the bondage of trade. After having been prosecuted and imprisoned for libelling the master-weavers of Paisley, during a violent dispute which had broken out between them and the journeymen, Wilson emigrated to America, where he landed in July, 1794, with his fowling-piece in his hand, and only a few shillings in his pocket, without a friend or letter of introduction, or any definite idea in what manner he was to earn his future livelihood. In the varied occupations of a weaver, pedlar, and school-master, he toiled on for upwards of eight years, during which time he tasked his powers to the very utmost in his efforts at self-improvement; and among the acquisitions he thus obtained were the arts of drawing, colouring, and etching, which afterwards proved of such incalculable use to him when bringing out his "Ornithology." In October, 1804, he set out upon an expedition to the Falls of Niagara; and, wading on through the mud and snow, encumbered with his gun and fowling-bag, the latter of which was of course always increasing in bulk, he arrived safely at home, after an absence of fifty-nine days, during which he had walked 1260 miles. From this time forward, Wilson applied his whole energies to his ornithological work, drawing, etching, and colouring all the plates himself; and Mr. Bradford, a bookseller of Philadelphia, having agreed to run all the risk of publication, in 1808 the first volume of his "American Ornithology" made its appearance. Another and another volume followed, and their indefatigable author travelled from one end of the American continent to the other, for the purpose of obtaining subscribers to his work, as well to increase his stores of ornithological curiosities. In 1811 he thus writes to his brother: "the ambition of being distinguished in the literary world, has required sacrifices and exertions from me with which you are unacquainted; and a wish to reach the glorious rock of independence, that I might from thence assist my relations, who are struggling with and buffeting the billows of adversity, has engaged me in an undertaking more laborious and extensive than you are aware of, and has occupied every moment of my time for several years. Since February, 1810, I have slept for several weeks in the wilderness alone, in an Indian country, with my gun and my pistols in my bosom; and have found myself so reduced by sickness as to be scarcely able to stand, when not within 300 miles of a white settlement, and under the burning latitude of 25 degrees. I have, by resolution, surmounted all these and other obstacles, in my way to my object, and now begin to see the blue sky of independence open around me." Honours as well as prompt soon after began to pour in upon him; he was a member of several learned societies, and there was not a crowned head in Europe, but had then become a subscriber to the "American Ornithology." But his end was fast approaching. He was attacked with a fatal dysentery in August, 1813, which carried him off in a few days. Though he did not attain great riches, yet his career furnishes a remarkable example of the success which, sooner or later, is the reward of perseverance.

WIMPEN, FELIX DE, a French military officer, born in 1741. He served with the French troops during the war between Great Britain and the United States; became a member of the tiers état, and proposed the establishment in France of what he termed a royal democracy; defended the fortress of Thionville, in 1792, against the Austrian and emigrant armies; was defeated at Vermon by the royalists; retired to Baveux, where he remained in obscurity till 1799, when the first consul gave him a pension.

WINCKELMANN, JOHN JUSTUS, a German historian, was born at Gnesen, in 1696, and died in 1697.

WINCKELMANN, JOHN JOACHIM, a celebrated German antiquary, born in 1718. He had a great taste for the arts, and wrote many works on subjects connected with sculpture, painting, &c. Having embraced the Catholic faith, he took a journey to Italy, to survey the treasures of art at the Vatican, and the relics discovered at Herculaneum. He was made keeper of the pope's cabinet of antiquities; and while returning from Germany, which country he had visited in 1764, he was barely assailed by a wretch named Archangelo, with whom he had fallen in company at Trieste. His murderer was soon after taken, and executed on the wheel.

WINDHAM, JOSEPH, an eminent antiquary, was born at Twickenham, in 1739; was educated at Eton, and Christ's college, Cambridge; went to Rome, and there took drawings of the monuments of antiquity; composed the principal part of the "Italian Antiquities," published by the Dilettanti Society, and assisted Stuart in his work on Athens. Died, 1810.

WINDHAM, WILLIAM, an eminent senator, was born in 1750, and entered parliament in 1782. Till the French revolution he acted with the opposition; but in 1794 he joined Mr. Pitt, and was appointed secretary at war, which office he held till 1801, when he vigorously opposed the ephemeral peace of Amiens. On the death of Mr. Pitt, Mr. Windham became secretary of state for the war department, but went out of place again the following year. Died, 1810.

WING, VINCENT, an astrological writer. He was the author of the "Celestial Harmony of the Visible World," an "Ephemeris for Thirty Years;" "Computatio Catholica," and "Astronomia Britannica." He died in 1668.

WINGATE, EDMUND, an eminent mathematician, was born in 1593, in Yorkshire; studied at Queen's college, Oxford, and at Gray's Inn, went to France, to instruct Henrietta Maria in the English language; espoused the popular side in the civil war; was an M.P.; and died in 1636. Among his works are a "Natural and Artificial Arithmetic;" "The Exact Surveyor;" "Ludus Mathematicus;" "Maxims of Reason;" and an "Abridgment of the Statutes."

WINSLOW, JAMES BENIGNUS, a celebrated Danish anatomist, was born in 1669, at Odensee; settled in France; and, in 1743, succeeded Mr. Munnald, as professor of anatomy and physiology, at the Royal Botanic Garden. His principal work, which still preserves its reputation undiminished, is "An Anatomical Exposition of the Structure of the Human Body." Died, 1780.

WINSOR, FREDERIC ALBERT, an enterprising projector, to whom the public is indebted for the beautiful gas lights which now illuminate our streets, &c.; made his first public experiments, at the Lyceum, in the Strand, in 1803. He afterwards lighted with gas the walls of Carlton Palace Gardens, on the King's birth-day, in 1807; and during 1809 and 1810, he lighted one side of Pall Mall, from the house which he then occupied in that street. He followed up his object with great perseverance, and at length obtained a charter of incorporation for a gas-light and coke company. In consequence, however, of some misunderstanding with the parties with whom he was associated, he did not obtain his expected remuneration. In 1813, he went to Paris, where he also erected gas-works, and established a company. Died, 1830.

WINSTANLEY, WILLIAM, a literary barber, who wrote the "Lives of the Poets;" "Select Lives of England's Worthies;" "Historical Rarities," &c. He died about 1680.

WINTER, JOHN WILLIAM DE, a Dutch admiral, was born in 1750. Having been an active partisan in the revolution which broke out in 1787, he was obliged to take refuge in France when the party of the stadtholder prevailed. In France he entered the army; served under Dommizet and Picbegré; and in a short time rose to the rank of general of brigade. general made him vice-admiral and commander of the naval forces at Texel. Here, with twenty-nine vessels, of which sixteen were ships of the line, he was completely defeated by Duncan, Oct. 7, 1797. Died, 1812.

WINTER, PETER VON, an eminent German musician, born at Mannheim, in 1734, and at the age of ten years, was appointed a member of the orchestra of the elector. He composed a variety of operas, oratorios, and other pieces of vocal and instrumental music, many of which possess very considerable merit. Died, 1823.

WINWOOD, SIR RALPH, a statesman, was born about 1561, at Aynhoe, in Northamptonshire. He was twice envoy to Holland; and was secretary of state in 1614, till his decease, in 1617. He wrote "Memorials of Affairs of State in the reigns of queen Elizabeth and king James I.," three volumes folio.

WISE, FRANCIS, a learned antiquary, born at Oxford, in 1695. He was the author of many ingenious works, principally on subjects connected with the antiquities of this country. Died, 1762.

WISHART, GEORGE, a Scotch protestant martyr, was born at the commencement of the 16th century. He embraced the protestant faith while travelling in Germany, and resided for some years at Cambridge, where he taught at Bene't college. In 1544 he returned to his native land, and exerted himself zealously in preaching the doctrines of the Reformation; for which, in 1546, he was condemned to the flames.

WITHER, GEORGE, a poet, whose works have lately been brought into repute by Sir Egerton Brydges and others, was born in 1566, at Bentworth, in Hampshire, and was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. In 1613 he was committed to prison for his satires, called "Abuses Stript and Whipt." In the civil war he espoused the popular cause, and rose to the rank of major-general; but having published a piece, called "Vox Vulgi," he was again incarcerated after the Restoration. Died, 1667.

WITHERING, WILLIAM, a physician and writer on botany, was born in 1741, at Wellington, in Shropshire; studied at Edinburgh; practised at Stafford, and afterwards at Birmingham; and died in 1790. His chief work is "A Systematic Arrangement of British Plants;" but he was the author of several others; and the native carbonate of barytes was discovered and first described by him.

WODHULL, MICHAEL, a poet, born at Thenford, in Northamptonshire. He lived on his paternal estate, and amused his leisure hours with literature; he wrote some miscellaneous poems, and translated the tragedies of Euripides.

WODKOW, ROBERT, a Scottish historian, was born in 1679, at Glasgow; studied at the university of that city, of which he afterwards became librarian; and attained great popularity as a preacher. He wrote a faithful "History of the Sufferings of the Church of Scotland." Died, 1734.

WOFFINGTON, MARGARET, a celebrated actress, was born at Dublin, in 1718.

Her first appearance in London was at Covent-garden theatre, in 1736, in the character of Sir Harry Wildair, in which she was eminently successful; as she generally was, in fact, in whatever parts she assumed. Her attractions in private life were also universally acknowledged, and her society sought by persons of rank and talents. Died, 1760.

WOLCOT, JOHN, a humourist and satiric poet, known by the name of Peter Pindar, was born in 1738, at Dordbrook, in Devonshire, and was apprenticed to his uncle, an apothecary at Truro, who ultimately left him the bulk of his property. Having taken the degree of M.D. he accompanied Sir William Trevelyan to the government of Jamaica, as physician. While residing at that island he took orders, and was presented with a living. On his return to England he settled at Truro, whence he removed to Helstone; and it was while he resided in Cornwall that he drew from obscurity the painter Opie, with whom, in 1780, he came to London. After his arrival in the metropolis he soon rendered himself conspicuous by his satires, which rapidly succeeded each other, and were highly popular. Among his most finished works are, "Lyric Odes to the Royal Academicians;" and "The Lousiad." In the decline of life he became blind, and died in 1819. His works have lost much of their interest, owing to the temporal and personal nature of the subjects; but they exhibit a racy humour and freshness, often imitated, but rarely equalled.

WOLFE, JAMES, the son of Lieutenant-general Edward Wolfe, was born at Wotton, in Kent, in 1726. He entered early into the army, and distinguished himself by his bravery and the decision of his character on many occasions during the German war. On his return from the continent, he was appointed to the command of the expedition against Quebec. The enterprise was great and hazardous; but general Wolfe, adhering to his own plan of operations, surmounted all obstacles, and on the heights of Abraham encountered the enemy; when, in the moment of victory, he received a ball in the wrist, and another in the body, which obliged him to be carried into the rear. There, while in the agonies of death, being roused by the sound of "They run!" he eagerly asked, "Who ran?" and being told the French, he exclaimed, "I thank God, and die contented." By this victory, which occurred Sept. 13, 1759, the conquest of Canada was ensured; nor has its aversion from the British throne since been attempted, until the revolutionary schemes of Papineau and his disaffected associates broke out into open rebellion at the end of 1837.

WOLFE, CHARLES, an Irish divine and a poet of great promise, was born in 1791, at Dublin; was educated at Hyde Abbey school, Winchester, and at Trinity college, Dublin; obtained the curacy of Ballycroy, which he exchanged for that of Cast Cauffield; and died, of consumption, in 1823. Among other pieces possessing very considerable merit, he wrote the well-known "Ode on the Death of Sir John Moore."

commencing, "Not a drum was heard;" which acquired much posthumous celebrity, and was pronounced by lord Byron "the most perfect ode in the language."

WOLFF, or WOLFPIUS, CHRISTIAN, an eminent German mathematician and philosopher, who filled the professor's chair in the university of Halle; and was eventually created a baron of the empire. His principal works are, "Elementa Mathematicæ Universæ," 5 vols.; "A System of Philosophy," 23 vols.; and a treatise "on the Law of Nature and Nations," 3 vols.—There were several other learned Germans of the name of WOLFPIUS.—JOHN CHRISTOPHER, a divine and philologist, born in 1663. He was author of many works on Hebrew and Greek literature; and bequeathed a vast collection of Rabbinical and Oriental books to the public library at Hamburgh, where he died, in 1739.—JEROME, an eminent critic and classical scholar, who died at Augsburg, in 1800.—JOHN, an historical and miscellaneous writer, who was employed as a diplomatist; and, at his death, in 1600, was governor of Mindelshelm.

WOLLASTON, WILLIAM, an ethical and theological writer, was born in 1659, at Cotton Clanford, in Staffordshire; was educated at Sidney college, Cambridge; took orders; but having come into possession of considerable property, he relinquished the clerical profession, and devoted his time to literary researches. His principal work is, "The Religion of Nature Delineated." Died, 1734.

WOLLASTON, WILLIAM HIDE, a physician and experimental philosopher, was great grandson of the foregoing, and born in 1706. His want of patronage as a physician induced him to give up the medical profession in disgust, and devote himself to scientific pursuits; the result of which was, that he became one of the most eminent chemists and experimentalists of modern times. Among his discoveries in mineralogy, are the two metals, palladium and rhodium, and the method of rendering platinum malleable; by the last of which he is said to have gained 30,000*l*. He invented a sliding scale of chemical equivalents, a goniometer, and the camera lucida. His papers in the Philosophical Transactions are numerous. Died, 1828.

WOLSEY, THOMAS, a celebrated cardinal, and minister of state under Henry VIII. was the son of a butcher at Ipswich, in Suffolk, and born there in 1471. After finishing his education at Oxford, he became tutor to the sons of the marquis of Dorset; was subsequently domestic chaplain to the archbishop of Canterbury; and, on going to court, he gained the favour of Henry VII., who sent him on an embassy to the emperor, and on his return made him dean of Lincoln. Henry VIII. gave him the living of Torrington, in Devon, and afterwards appointed him register of the garter, and canon of Windsor. He next obtained the deanery of York, and, attending the king to Tournay, in France, was made bishop of that city. In 1514 he was advanced to the see of Lincoln, and the year following to the archbishopric of York. Insatiable in the pursuit of emolument, he obtained the administration of the see of Bath and Wells, and the temporalities of the abbey of St. Alban's; soon after which he enjoyed, in succession, the rich bishoprics of Durham and Winchester. By these means, his revenues nearly equalled those of the crown, part of which he expended in pomp and ostentation, and part in laudable munificence for the advancement of learning. He founded several lectures at Oxford, where he also erected the college of Christ-church, and built a palace at Hampton-court, which he presented to the king. He was at this time in the zenith of power, and had a complete ascendancy over the mind of Henry, who made him lord chancellor, and obtained for him a cardinalship. He was also nominated the pope's legate; but having given offence to the king, by not promoting his divorce, he fell into disgrace, and his property was confiscated. In 1539 he was apprehended at York; but was taken ill, and died on his way to London, exclaiming, "Had I but served my God as faithfully as I have served my king, he would not have given me over in my grey hairs."

WOOD, ANTHONY, an eminent English biographer and antiquary, was born in 1632, at Oxford, and was educated at Merton college. His "History and Antiquities of Oxford," which was translated into Latin by Dr. Fell, appeared in 1674, and his "Athenæ Oxonienses" was published in 1691. An attack upon lord Clarendon, in the last of these works, subjected him to a sentence of expulsion from the university, and his prejudices in favour of Jacobitism rendered him an object of hatred to the other party. Died, 1686.

WOOD, ROBERT, an accomplished scholar, was born in 1716, at Riverstown, county of Meath; made the tour of Greece, Egypt, and Palestine, in 1761; and was appointed under-secretary of state in 1759. He wrote a "Description of the Ruins of Balbec," the "Ruins of Palmyra," &c. Died, 1771.

WOOD, JAMES, proprietor of the Old Gloucester Bank,—a millionaire, whose riches and parsimonious eccentricities entitled him to a place among the "remarkable characters" of the age,—was born at Gloucester in 1756; and succeeded to the bank, which had been there established, in 1716, by his grandfather. In conjunction with the bank, he kept a shop, to the day of his death, and dealt in almost every article that could be asked for; nothing was too trifling for "Jemmy Wood" by which a penny could be turned, and nothing too extensive for him to supply—a farthing rushlight, or a merchant's shipping order. He was a bachelor, and spent the whole week in his banking-shop, or rather his shop-bank (for it is worthy of remark, that the business of the "Old Gloucester Bank" was transacted at one end of his multifarious chandlery store); he entertained no company, visited none, took his country walk of a Sunday in order to enjoy a frugal meal in the open air, and ever made it his especial care not to diminish his wealth by attending to the calls of humanity. He died April 20, 1838; leaving his vast property to be divided between his four execu-tons, viz. Mr. (now Sir) Matthew Wood, of London (but who is not related to him); Mr. John Chadborne, of Gloucester, (his attorney); Mr. Jacob Osborne, and Mr. John Surman, of Gloucester, (his two clerks). In preparation for the probate of this will, the personal property of the deceased was sworn under 900,000*l.*; but Mr. James Wood, of Islington, who is stated to be one of nine consins of the deceased, entered a caveat against the probate. A codicil was afterwards discovered, by which various legacies are bequeathed to his kindred, besides a very large sum to the corporation of Gloucester: this codicil, however, was not satisfactorily authenticated.

WOODB, BABIL, a clergyman of the church of England, distinguished as a most active member of Bible and Missio ary Societies, and other religious associations. He was born at Richmond, in Surrey, in 1760; was educated at Trinity college, Oxford; became rector of St. Peter's, Cornhill, and morning preacher at Bentinck chapel; and died in 1831. His "Advice to Youth;" "The Duties of the Marriage State," &c. are well known.

WOODDESON, RICHARD, an eminent civilian, was born in 1745, at Kingston, in Surrey; was educated at Pembroke and Magdalen colleges, Oxford; and chosen Vinerian professor, on the resignation of Sir Robert Chambers. He wrote "Elements of Jurisprudence;" "A Systematic View of the Laws of England;" and "A brief Vindication of the Rights of the British Legislature." Died, 1822.

WOODFALL, WILLIAM, a printer and parliamentary reporter, who became in some measure a public character from his being exposed to a prosecution as publisher of the famous "Letters of Junius." Being gifted with a wonderfully retentive memory, he reported the debates in parliament with great ability and precision, and was the first who introduced them to the public after their present fashion. Died, 1803.

WOODHOUSE, ROBERT, an eminent mathematician, was educated at Cambridge. He was elected Lucasian professor in 1820, Plinian professor in 1822, and keeper of the observatory in 1824. He wrote "The Principles of Analytical Calculation;" "A Treatise on Trigonometry;" another on "Plane Astronomy," &c. Died, 1827.

WOODVILLE, ELIZABETH, widow of Sir John Grey, who was slain in the battle of Bernard's Heath. After his death she applied to Edward IV. for the restoration of his estate, when that monarch fell in love with, and married her. The princess Elizabeth was the fruit of this marriage, who married Henry VII. and thus united the houses of York and Lancaster.

WOODVILLE, WILLIAM, an eminent physician, was born in 1752, at Cockermouth; studied at Edinburgh; and settled in London, where he became physician to the Middlesex Dispensary and the Smallpox Hospital. He was the author of "Medical Botany;" and the "History of the Smallpox Inoculation." Died, 1803.

WOODWARD, JOHN, a physician and naturalist, was born in Derbyshire, in 1665. In 1692 he became professor of physic at Gresham college; and in 1696 published an "Essay towards a natural History of the Earth." Died, 1728.

WOODWARD, HENRY, a celebrated comedian, was born in London, in 1717, and was unrivalled in such parts as Mordant, Sir Andrew Aguecheek, &c. As a composer of pantomimes also he had great merit; and he was the author of some few dramatic pieces. Died, 1777.

WOOLSTON, THOMAS, a delictical writer, was born in 1669, at Northampton, and became a fellow of Sidney college, Cambridge. His first work, "The Old Apology for the Truth of the Christian Religion revived," was meant to prove that the actions of Moses were typical of Christ and the church; but he gradually became a deist, and his "Six Discourses on Miracles" subjected him to a prosecution, and he was fined and imprisoned. Died, 1732.

WORLDRIDGE, THOMAS, a portrait-painter and engraver, whose etchings after Rembrandt are peculiarly excellent. He published a book of gems from the antique. Died, 1766.

WORMIUS, OLAVS, an able Danish physician and antiquary, was born in 1586; was made a canon of the cathedral of Lunden by Christian IV. as a reward for his medical services; and died in 1654. His principal works relate to Danish and Norwegian history and antiquities.

WORDSDALE, JAMES, a painter and dramatic writer. He was pupil to Sir Godfrey Kneller, whose niece he married. His dramatic performances obtained much temporary notoriety. Died, 1767.

WORSLEY, Sir RICHARD, bart., was born in 1731, in the Isle of Wight; and became governor of the island, commander of his majesty's household, and member of parliament for Newport. He resided in Italy many years, and made a large collection of antiquities, of which a catalogue was published, under the title of "Museum Worsleyanum." Sir Richard also wrote the "History of the Isle of Wight." Died, 1804.

WORTHINGTON, WILLIAM, a learned divine, was born in Merionethshire, in 1708; was educated at Jesus college, Oxford; and obtained prebends in the cathedrals of Asaph, and York. His principal works are an "Essay on the Scheme of Redemption;" "On the historical Sense of the Mosaic Account of the Fall of Man;" and "The Scripture Theory of the Earth." Died, 1778.

WOTTON, Sir HENRY, a diplomatist and political writer, was born in 1648, at Boughton Hall, in Kent; was educated at Winchester and Oxford; became secretary to the earl of Essex, whom he accompanied on his expedition against the Spaniards, and into Ireland; and on the fall of that nobleman, he went to reside at Florence. James I. employed him on various missions to Italy and Germany. He was made provost at Etou college in 1694; and died in 1830. He wrote "Elements of Architecture;" "The State of Christendom;" and "Reliquie Wottonianae."

of great learning; born, 1686; died, 1736. His chief works are, "Reflections upon Ancient and Modern Learning," and "The History of Rome from the death of Antoninus Pius to the death of Severus Alexander."

WOUVERMANS, PHILIP, an eminent painter, was born at Haerlem, in 1620. His hunting pieces, landscapes, and battle scenes, are admirable. Died, 1668.

WRAXALL, Sir NATHANIEL WILLIAM, bart., an eminent traveller and historical writer, was born at Bristol, in 1751. He entered into the civil service of the East India Company, and in 1771 acted as judge-advocate and pay-master of the forces for the presidency of Bombay. Next year he returned to England, and then travelled on the continent, visiting almost every country from Naples to Lapland. He published several "Tours;" the "History of the House of Valois;" "Memoirs of the Courts of Berlin, Dresden, Warsaw, and Vienna;" "The History of France," 6 vols. 8vo., &c. In 1813 he was created a baronet; and, in 1815, he published his last work, "Historical Memoirs of His Own Time," 2 vols. 8vo. In these memoirs, which contain a fund of anecdote, was a libel on count Woronzow, the Russian ambassador; for which Sir Nathaniel was sentenced to a fine and six months' imprisonment. He died at Dover, while on his way to Naples, in 1831, aged 80.

WREN, MATTHEW, a learned prelate; successively bishop of Hereford, Norwich, and Ely. During the civil war, he was impeached by the Commons, and sent to the Tower, where he lay eighteen years, without any trial. At the restoration, he visited his diocese, and built a new chapel in Pembroke hall, Cambridge. Died, 1687.

WREN, Sir CHRISTOPHER, a celebrated architect and mathematician, was born at East Knoyle, in Wiltshire, in 1632; studied at Wadham college, Oxford; was chosen a fellow of All Souls, in 1653; was appointed professor of astronomy at Gresham college, in 1657; and in 1661 was nominated to the Savilian professorship, and created LL.D. His fame as an architect had by this time widely spread; and he received a commission. In 1663, to produce designs for the restoration of St. Paul's cathedral, then one of the most remarkable Gothic edifices in the kingdom. To prepare himself for the execution of this great undertaking, he made a visit to France, in 1665, and then finished the designs; but while they were under consideration, the cathedral was destroyed by the fire of 1666. Wren had now an opportunity for signalizing his talents by the erection of an entirely new structure. The contemporaneous destruction of fifty parochial churches and many public buildings, also furnished an ample field for his genius; and he would have had the honour of founding, as it were, a new city, if the design which he laid before the king and parliament could have been adopted; but private interests prevented its acceptance. On the death of Sir John Denham, he succeeded to the office of surveyor of the works; and, in 1674, received the honour of knighthood. His greatest performances were the Monument; Greenwich hospital; Hampton-court; St. Mary-le-Bow; St. Michael, Cornhill; St. Dunstan in the east; St. Magnus, London-bridge; St. Stephen, Walbrook; and, above all, St. Paul's cathedral; which he lived to see completed. In 1680 he was chosen president of the Royal Society; was afterwards appointed architect and commissioner of Chelsea hospital; and controller of the works at Windsor. He was elected M.P. for the borough of Plympton, in 1683, and for Weymouth, in 1700. After having long been the highest ornament of his profession, he was, in 1718, to the disgrace of the administration, deprived of the surveyorship of the royal works, merely from political motives; he was then in the 85th year of his age. He died, Feb. 25, 1723, aged 90, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral.

WREN, CHRISTOPHER, son of the preceding, was a learned antiquary, and collected Memoirs of his family, which in 1730 were published by Dr. Stephen Wren, his son, under the title of "Parentalia."

WRIGHT, EDWARD, a mathematician, born at Garveston, in Norfolk; to whom is attributed the discovery of the true method of dividing the meridian line. Died, 1615.

WRIGHT, JOSEPH, a celebrated painter, usually styled "Wright of Derby," was born in that town in 1734. He was first placed under Hudson, the portrait-painter; afterwards visited Italy, where he made great advances in his profession; returned to England in 1755, and was elected an associate of the Royal Academy. He settled at Derby; painted many admirable landscapes, &c.; and died in 1797.

WRIGHT, WALTER RODWELL, author of "Horse Ionica," descriptive of the Isles of Greece, which lord Byron has warmly eulogized. He died in 1826, at Malta, where he held the situation of president of the Court of Appeal.

WURMSER, DAGOBERT SIGISMUND, count, an Austrian field-marshal, who displayed great bravery and skill in the wars with France. He drove the republican troops out of Alsace in 1793; took Mannheim in 1794; and contended successfully against the French in Italy in 1796; but was at length obliged to submit to the superior numbers of the enemy, at Mantua, after an obstinate defence and the loss of 24,000 men. He died in 1797, aged 80.

WYAT, Sir THOMAS, a distinguished courtier, statesman, and poet, was born in 1503, at Allington, in Kent; was educated at Cambridge and Oxford; became a favourite of Henry VIII., and was employed by him on various missions; and died in 1541. His poetical works consist of odes, love elegies, &c. and possess a considerable degree of elegance.

WYATT, JAMES, an eminent architect, was born at Burton, in Staffordshire, about 1743; and studied architecture and painting at Rome. On his return to England, he erected the Pantheon in Oxford-street; and he succeeded Sir William Chambers as surveyor-general to the board of works. He also became a member of the Royal Academy, and for some time sat as pres-

In 1813 he was created a baronet; and, in 1815, he published his last work, "Historical Memoirs of His Own Time," 2 vols. 8vo. In these memoirs, which contain a fund of anecdote, was a libel on count Woronzow, the Russian ambassador; for which Sir Nathaniel was sentenced to a fine and six months' imprisonment. He died at Dover, while on his way to Naples, in 1831, aged 80.

WREN, MATTHEW, a learned prelate; successively bishop of Hereford, Norwich, and Ely. During the civil war, he was impeached by the Commons, and sent to the Tower, where he lay eighteen years, without any trial. At the restoration, he visited his diocese, and built a new chapel in Pembroke hall, Cambridge. Died, 1687.

WREN, Sir CHRISTOPHER, a celebrated architect and mathematician, was born at East Knoyle, in Wiltshire, in 1632; studied at Wadham college, Oxford; was chosen a fellow of All Souls, in 1653; was appointed professor of astronomy at Gresham college, in 1657; and in 1661 was nominated to the Savilian professorship, and created LL.D. His fame as an architect had by this time widely spread; and he received a commission, in 1663, to produce designs for the restoration of St. Paul's cathedral, then one of the most remarkable Gothic edifices in the kingdom. To prepare himself for the execution of this great undertaking, he made a visit to France, in 1665, and then finished the designs; but while they were under consideration, the cathedral was destroyed by the fire of 1666. Wren had now an opportunity for signaling his talents by the erection of an entirely new structure. The contemporaneous destruction of fifty parochial churches and many public buildings, also furnished an ample field for his genius; and he would have had the honour of founding, as it were, a new city, if the design which he laid before the king and parliament could have been adopted; but private interests prevented its acceptance. On the death of Sir John Denham, he succeeded to the office of surveyor of the works; and, in 1674, received the honour of knighthood. His greatest performances were the Monument; Greenwich hospital; Hampton-court; St. Mary-le-Bow; St. Michael, Cornhill; St. Dunstan in the east; St. Magnus, London-bridge; St. Stephen, Walbrook; and, above all, St. Paul's cathedral; which he lived to see completed. In 1680 he was chosen president of the Royal Society; was afterwards appointed architect and commissioner of Chelsea hospital; and comptroller of the works at Windsor. He was elected M.P. for the borough of Plympton, in 1685, and for Weymouth, in 1700. After having long been the highest ornament of his profession, he was, in 1718, to the disgrace of the administration, deprived of the surveyorship of the royal works, merely from political motives; he was then in the 85th year of his age. He died, Feb. 25, 1723, aged 90, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral.

WREN, CHRISTOPHER, son of the preceding, was a learned antiquary, and collected Memoirs of his family, which in 1750 were published by Dr. Stephen Wren, his son, under the title of "Parentalia."

WRIGHT, EDWARD, a mathematician, born at Garveston, in Norfolk; to whom is attributed the discovery of the true method of dividing the meridian line. Died, 1615.

WRIGHT, JOSEPH, a celebrated painter, usually styled "Wright of Derby," was born in that town in 1734. He was first placed under Hudson, the portrait-painter; afterwards visited Italy, where he made great advances in his profession; returned to England in 1755, and was elected an associate of the Royal Academy. He settled at Derby; painted many admirable landscapes, &c.; and died in 1797.

WRIGHT, WALTER RODWELL, author of "Horn, Ionia," descriptive of the Isles of Greece, which lord Byron has warmly eulogized. He died in 1826, at Malta, where he held the situation of president of the Court of Appeal.

WURNISER, DAUGBERT SIGISMUND, count, an Austrian field-marshal, who displayed great bravery and skill in the wars with France. He drove the republican troops out of Alsace in 1793; took Mannheim in 1794; and contended successfully against the French in Italy in 1796; but was at length obliged to submit to the superior numbers of the enemy, at Mantua, after an obstinate defence and the loss of 24,000 men. He died in 1797, aged 80.

WYAT, Sir THOMAS, a distinguished courtier, statesman, and poet, was born in 1503, at Allington, in Kent; was educated at Cambridge and Oxford; became a favourite of Henry VIII., and was employed by him on various missions; and died in 1541. His poetical works consist of odes, love elegies, &c. and possess a considerable degree of elegance.

WYATT, JAMES, an eminent architect, was born at Burton, in Staffordshire, about 1743; and studied architecture and painting at Rome. On his return to England, he erected the Pantheon in Oxford street; and he succeeded Sir William Chambers as surveyor-general to the board of works. He also became a member of the Royal Academy, and for some time sat as president of that institution. Fonthill abbey, New palace, and many other edifices, owe whatever merit they possess to his skill as an architect. He died in 1813.

WYCHERLEY, WILLIAM, a dramatic writer and man of fashion in the time of Charles II., was born in 1640, at Cleve, in Shropshire; studied the law; but having a taste for poetry and the drama, he came into notice as the author of "Love in a Wood," a comedy, and obtained through it the patronage of the duchess of Cleveland, the profligate duke of Buckingham, and the monarch himself. He at length lost the king's favour by clandestinely marrying the countess of Drogheda, a young, rich, and beautiful widow; and although at her death she settled her fortune on him, yet his title being disputed, the law expenses produced embarrassment and arrests, and he remained in confinement seven years. He was at last released from prison by James II., who gave him a pension of 200*l.* per annum. He was the author of the comedies of the "Plain Dealer," the "Gentleman Dancing Master," and the "Country Wife;" besides poems, &c. Died, 1715.

WYDEVILLE, or WOODVILLE, ANTHONY, earl RIVERS, an accomplished nobleman of the 15th century, was born in 1442. In consequence of his sister having been married to Edward IV. he shared in all the vicissitudes which befel that warlike and luxurious monarch, and became governor of Calais, and captain-general of the king's forces. He was also made governor of prince Edward, and chief butler of England. On the death of the king, the earl assembled a body of troops, with the intention of crowning his nephew; but his design was defeated by the machinations of the duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III., who caused the gallant nobleman to be beheaded, without trial, in the castle of Pontefract, June 13, 1483.

WYKEHAM, WILLIAM, of bishop of Winchester, and lord high chancellor of England, was born in 1324, at Wickham, in Hampshire, of respectable parents, but poor, and was indebted for his education to Nicholas Uredale, governor of Winchester castle. On the completion of his studies, he became private secretary to his patron, and was by him eventually recommended to the notice of Edward III. The talents, diligence, and integrity he displayed in the service of the king, raised him gradually to a distinguished place in the royal favour; and being appointed surveyor of the works at Windsor, under his directions that splendid structure was completed. He now gradually, but rapidly, rose to the highest dignities both in church and state. In 1357 he was presented to the rectory of Pulham, in Norfolk, to which was added a prebend in the church of Lichfield; and in 1360 he was made dean of the collegiate church of St. Martin le Grand, London. He was also successively appointed keeper of the privy seal, secretary to the king, and governor of the great council. In 1366 he was advanced to the bishopric of Winchester, and in the following year was made chancellor of England. These high dignities he sustained with honour and ability; dedicating a large portion of his temporalities to the improvement of his cathedral. Owing to the influence of a party, headed by John of Gaunt, who were strongly opposed to the increasing wealth and influence of the clergy, he was compelled to resign the seals in 1371; but the esteem in which he was held by the people generally, compensated for the loss; and on the accession of Richard II. he was restored to his dignities and emoluments. In 1386 he completed his magnificent foundation of New college, Oxford; in the chapel of which is still to be seen his crozier, or pastoral staff, supposed to be the only one in England. He also built and endowed St. Mary's college, at Winchester; and having, in 1391, a second time resigned the chancellorship, he devoted the remainder of his life to the superintendence of his noble establishments, and the exercise of Christian benevolence. He died Sept. 24, 1404, and was buried in Winchester cathedral, where a splendid monument is erected to the memory of his worthy and munificent benefactor.

WYNANTZ, JOHN, an eminent Dutch landscape painter, born at Haarlem, in 1640. He was the instructor of Philip Wouvermans, and is famous for the boldness of his designs and the delicacy of his tints. Died, 1670.

WYNDHAM, Sir WILLIAM, a celebrated statesman, was a native of Somersetshire, and born in 1687. Having been elected M.P. for the county, he soon became conspicuous as one of the ablest senators in the House. He was appointed secretary of war, and afterwards chancellor of the exchequer; but being displaced on the death of queen Anne, he took a leading part in opposition, and signalized himself by his defence of the duke of Ormond and the earls of Oxford and Strafford, when impeached by the Commons. He was committed to the Tower in 1716, on the charge of being concerned in the rebellion of the earl of Mar, but was never brought to trial. Died, 1740.—His eldest son, CHARLES WYNDHAM, became earl of Egremont, and died in 1763.

WYNNE, JOHN HUDDLESTONE, a miscellaneous writer, was born in Wales, in 1713; followed the business of a printer in London for a time; then obtained a commission in the army; and eventually sat down as an author by profession. His principal works are, "A General History of the British Empire, in America," 2 vols.; "A General History of Ireland," 2 vols.; and "Fables for the Female Sex." He died in 1788.

WYTENBACH, DANIEL, a learned philologist, was born at Berne, in 1746; studied at Marburg and Göttingen; obtained the professorship of philosophy and literature at the Remonstrants' college at Amsterdam; and was subsequently appointed philosophical professor at the Athenaeum in that city. His chief works are, "Epistola Critica;" "Precepta Philosophiæ Logicæ;" and an edition of the "Moral Works of Plutarch." Died, 1820.

X.

XANTIPPUS, a Lacedæmonian general, who defeated the Romans under Regulus.

XAVIER, St. FRANCIS, styled "The Apostle of the Indies," a celebrated Spanish missionary, was born at the castle of Xavier, in Navarre, in 1506; studied at Paris; and became one of the most zealous disciples of Ignatius Loyola, with whom he formed an intimate friendship. He was sent by John III. king of Portugal, to the East Indies, to preach the Gospel; arrived at Goa in 1542, and propagated the Christian faith, not only in that city, but in Japan and the neighbouring islands. He was proceeding to China as a Christian missionary when he died, in 1552.

XENOCRATES, a Greek philosopher, remarkable for the severity of his manners and his incorruptible integrity, was born at Chalcedon, A.C. 400. He was sent on an embassy to Philip, king of Macedon, and afterwards to Antipater, neither of whom could corrupt him by presents. Notwithstanding this, the Athenians were so ungateful, that they caused him to be sold as a slave, because he was too poor to pay the taxes. Demetrius Phalerus, however, discharged the debt, and gave him his freedom. Died, A.C. 314.

XENOPHANES, a Greek philosopher, born at Colophon, was founder of the Eleatic sect, and became a preceptor in the Pythagorean school; but added many new opinions of his own to that philosophy, particularly on the immutability of matter. Died, A.C. 436.

XENOPHON, an illustrious Athenian philosopher, soldier, and historian, was born A.C. 450. He was the disciple of Socrates, whose doctrines he imbibed, and whom he accompanied to the Peloponnesian war. He afterwards went to the court of Cyrus, with whom he was in great favour; but when that prince was killed at the battle of Cunaxa, Xenophon and ten thousand Greeks effected their march home, in spite of all opposition. After this, he went into Asia with Agesilaus, king of the Lacedæmonians; and, in his absence, the Athenians passed a decree of banishment against him; on which he withdrew to a retreat in Elis, near Olympia, where he employed himself in composing works on history and philosophy, and in rural occupations and amusements, until his death, A.C. 360. The principal of Xenophon's works which are extant, are, the "Cyropædia," or the life, discipline, and actions of the elder Cyrus; seven books of the "Expedition of the younger Cyrus into Persia, and of the retreat of the ten thousand Greeks;" four books of the "Memorabilia of Socrates," and the "Hellenica, or Grecian History." His style has always been admired for sweetness, Attic purity, and singular clearness.

XERXES, the 8th king of Persia, and second son of Darius Hystaspes. He conquered Egypt, and then turned his arms against Greece, with an army of 800,000 men, and 100 ships. He was slain by Artabanus, the captain of his guards, A.C. 465.

XIMENES, RODRIG, archbishop of Toledo in the 13th century; author of a "History of Spain."

XIMENES DE CISNEROS, FRANCISCO, a celebrated Spanish prelate and statesman, was born at Torrelaguna, in Old Castile, in 1437, and died in 1517. After having filled various benefices, he became a monk of the Franciscan order, and attained great reputation as a preacher. When he was raised to the archbishopric of Toledo, he continued to preserve the austere habits of the cloister. He subsequently became prime minister and a cardinal; and few men have displayed more ability or firmness. He founded the university of Alcalá.

XIMENES, FRANCIS, one of the twelve friars who first preached Christianity to the Mexicans. During his residence in Mexico, he collected a great deal of information relative to the plants and animals of that country, and published a treatise on the subject, which is allowed to possess considerable merit.

XYLANDER, WILLIAM, a celebrated scholar, was born at Augsburg, in 1532. He translated into Latin the works of Dion Cassius, Marcus Antoninus, Plutarch, and Strabo; was professor of Greek at Heidelberg; and died in 1576.

XYPHILIN, JOHN, patriarch of Constantinople in the 11th century, was a man of great erudition and exemplary manners. Died, 1075.—His nephew, of the same name, was the author of a Greek abridgement of Dion Cassius; and is often confounded with his uncle.

YALDEN, THOMAS, a divine and poet, was born at Exeter, in 1671, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he formed an intimacy with Addison and Sacheverell, which lasted through life. He obtained the rectories of Chalfon and Cleanville, in Herefordshire; and, in 1713, was appointed preacher to Bridewell hospital, on the resignation of Dr. Atterbury. Among his poetical pieces are "The Temple of Fame," "The Conquest of Namur," &c. Died, 1736.

YATES, RICHARD, a comic actor, who for many years was a public favourite in Fendlewife, in the Old Bachelor, and similar characters. Died, 1796.

YATES, ANNA MARIA, wife of the preceding, was a tragic actress of great ability; and on the death of Mrs. Cibber, in 1765, she for a time became the unrivalled heroine of the stage. Died, 1787.

YEARSLEY, ANNE, a poetical and dramatic writer, was born about 1736, at Bristol. She was originally a milk-woman; but, under the auspices of Hannah More, a volume of her productions was published by subscription in 1785, the profits of which enabled her to open a circulating library at the Hot Wells. Her principal publications are, "Poems on various Subjects;" "Earl Godwin," a tragedy; and "The Royal Captives," a romance.

YEATS, THOMAS PATTINSON, an eminent entomologist; author of "Institutions of Entomology," &c. He was a fellow of the Royal Society; and died in 1782.

YELIN, JULIUS CONRAD VON, an eminent natural philosopher and mathematician, was by birth a Bavarian, and became councillor of finance, a knight of the Order of Merit, and a member of the academy of Sciences at Munich. In 1826 he made a scientific tour through France, England, and Scotland; but was taken ill at Edinburgh, and there died. He published a treatise "On Magnetism and Electricity;" an "Introduction to Experimental Philosophy," &c.

YELVERTON, Sir HENRY, an eminent English judge, born in 1566. He successively filled the offices of solicitor-general, attorney-general, and judge; published "Reports of Special Cases;" and died in 1630.

YERMAK, a Cossack chief, in the 16th century, who with only six thousand men conquered Siberia. The subjugated territory he transferred to the czar of Muscovy, who loaded him with honours. Died, 1585.

YORK, FREDERIC, duke of, second son of George III., was born August 16, 1763; and in the February following he was elected prince-bishop of Osnaburg, in Germany. In 1790 he was appointed a brevet-colonel in the British army, and went to the continent in order to study military tactics in the school of the great Frederic at Berlin. In 1784 he was created duke of York and Albany; returned from the continent in 1787; took his seat in the House of Lords in the same year; and, in 1789, fought a duel, which had nearly proved fatal to him, with colonel Lenoir, afterwards duke of Richmond. In 1791 he married the eldest daughter of the king of Prussia; was placed at the head of the British army in Flanders, in 1793; and, after alternate success, was expelled from that country by the French. Nor was he more fortunate in 1799, when he was employed in Holland, being under the necessity of signing a disadvantageous convention. In 1802 a series of charges were preferred against him in the House of Commons by colonel Wardle, for having suffered a female favourite, named Mary Anne Clarke, to influence him in the disposal of commissions in the army; but as nothing occurred to implicate the duke in the corrupt transactions between Mrs. Clarke and the persons to whom she sold her services, he was acquitted. His royal highness, however, thought proper to resign his post of commander-in-chief; but he was reinstated about two years after by the prince regent; and from that time he exercised the most rigid impartiality in the distribution of promotion, while he attended to the rights and comforts of the soldier, and enforced at the same time the necessity of strict discipline and subordination. He was humane, frank, affable, and benevolent; but a passion for high play was fatal to his own repose, and threw a shade over his manly and generous character. He died January 5, 1837.

YORKE, admiral Sir JOSEPH SIDNEY, K.C.B., entered the navy as a midshipman in 1760, and was in the actions with Lord Rodney of the 9th and 12th of April, 1782. He was made lieutenant in 1769, and appointed master and commander to the Rattlesnake; promoted to the rank of post-captain in 1793; continued in active employ on various services; and in 1806 he received the honour of knighthood. In 1810 Sir Joseph was appointed to a seat at the admiralty board; was made vice-admiral in 1814, and became admiral of the blue, in 1830. During his parliamentary career he was distinguished by his honest zeal for the interests of his profession, and by his irresistible good humour, which often proved successful in appeasing the angry feelings of debate. He had been with captains Brady and Young to Spithead, and on their return, the vessel was upset in Stokes Bay, and all perished, May 5, 1831.

YOUNG, EDWARD, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was born in 1679, at Uppham, Hants, and was educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford. Though designed for the law, he chose the clerical profession, and, in 1718, was appointed chaplain to the king. His poetical reputation he had already established by the poems of "The Last Day," "The Force of Religion," and the "Love of Fame;" and the tragedies of "The Revenge," and "Busiris." His "Night Thoughts," which abound in sublime passages, though sometimes rather obscure, are supposed to have been prompted by the death of his wife, whom he lost in 1741. As a prose writer, he is chiefly known by his "Centaur not Fabulous," and "Conjectures on original Composition." His fame, however, rests altogether on his poetry, particularly his "Night Thoughts." Died, 1765, aged 63.

YOUNG, MATTHEW, an Irish mathematician and divine, was born in 1760, in the county of Roscommon; was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, where in 1796 he became professor of philosophy; was raised to the see of Clonfert by marquis Cornwallis; and died in 1800. He was the author of "An Analysis of the Principles of Natural Philosophy," and "The Method of Prime and Ultimate Ratios."

YOUNG, Sir WILLIAM, a political and miscellaneous writer, was born in 1736, at Charlton-house, near Canterbury; studied at Eton, Cambridge, and Oxford; was an M.P. for St. Mawes, in 1783; and died in 1818, governor of Tobago. His principal works are, "The History of Athens;" "The West India Common-place Book;" and "The Rights of Placemen." He also edited the "Contemplatio Philosophica," of his maternal grandfather, Dr. Brook Taylor.

YOUNG, ARTHUR, an eminent writer on agriculture, was born in 1741, at Bradfield, in Suffolk. With a desire to improve British husbandry, he made innumerable experiments at home, and also travelled over the greatest part of Great Britain, Ireland, France, Spain, and Italy. In 1770 he published his "Farmer's Calendar," which became a popular work; and also a periodical, entitled the "Annals of Agriculture." On the establishment of the Board of Agriculture he was appointed secretary, which office he held till his decease, in 1820. Besides the works already mentioned, he published his "Tour in England, Ireland, and France."

YOUNG, Dr. THOMAS, F.R.S., and F.L.S., a celebrated physician and natural philosopher, was born at Milverton, in Somersetshire, in 1774; was educated at Göttingen, and Edinburgh; became physician to St. George's Hospital, and foreign secretary of the Royal Society; and distinguished himself as a man of great literary and scientific acquirements. His chief works are, "A Course of Lectures on Natural Philosophy;" an "Introduction to Medical Literature;" a "Practical and Historical Treatise on Consumptive Diseases;" and "Elementary Illustrations of the Celestial Mechanics of La Place." Dr. Young contributed to Hodgkin's Caligraphia Græca, Dalzell's "Collectanea Majora," and the "Supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica." He also interested himself greatly in the discoveries made by Belzoni in Egypt, and engaged in researches concerning Egyptian hieroglyphics; upon which, and various other learned subjects, he published his observations. Died, 1829.

YOUNG, Sir ARTHUR WILLIAM, colonel. This officer entered the army in 1796, as ensign; and became a captain in the 13th foot the following year, by purchase. His first active duty was in Ireland, during the rebellion; his next in Egypt, 1801; and, for several years after, in Sicily and at Gibraltar, he acted as aid-de-camp to general Fox. In 1807 he obtained the rank of major in the 47th, and was present at the battles of Vimiera, Talavera, Busaco, Badajoz, &c. In 1813 he was promoted to a lieutenant-colonelcy in the 3rd West India regiment, stationed at Trinidad; and in 1815 he was sent to join the expedition against Guadaloupe, and received one of the badges of the Order of Merit, presented by Louis XVIII. He was next selected to command the troops in Grenada, where his conduct gave the highest satisfaction; and on his being ordered back to Trinidad, the council of assembly presented him with a sword, value 100 guineas. From this time to the final disbandment of the 3rd West India regiment, in 1825, he administered the government at various times during the absence of Sir Ralph Woodford, and was rewarded for the "candour, integrity, and impartiality which had marked his administration," by 150 guineas for a sword, and a piece of plate, value 350*l*. In 1826 lieutenant-colonel Young was appointed to the office of protector of slaves in Demerara; in 1831 he was made lieutenant-governor of Prince Edward's Island; and in 1834 he received the honour of knighthood. Died, 1835.

YPSILANTI, prince ALEXANDER, the first active agent in the Greek revolution, son of Demetrius, hospodar of Wallachia, was born at Constantinople, in 1792. About the year 1805 Ypsilanti's father received a summons from the grand seignor to repair to Constantinople, and judging that obedience to the command might cost him his life, he determined on retiring into Russia. The son, adopting the military profession, entered into the Russian army; was a captain of hussars, when a bail, at the battle of Dresden, carried away his right hand; attained the rank of major-general; and was made aid-de-camp to the emperor. In 1820 he became acquainted with the Hetaïreia, of which association he eventually became the leader. When he saw that the breaking out of the insurrection in Greece could no longer be delayed, he resolved to plant in Moldavia the standard of revolt. He crossed the Pruth with a few attendants, and in March, 1821, he issued a proclamation, announcing that Greece had kindled the torch of freedom, and thrown off the yoke of tyranny. The emperor Alexander, to express publicly his disapprobation of the undertaking of the Hetaïrists, summoned Ypsilanti, to make his defence; and as he did not obey, he caused his name to be struck from the rolls of the Russian army. After sustaining repeated defeats, Ypsilanti gave up the cause of Greece. Having crossed the frontiers, he was arrested in Transylvania, and long held captive, as a prisoner of state in the fortress of Mungatsch. He died at Vienna in 1828, aged 36. Ypsilanti undoubtedly possessed the necessary courage; but his ridiculous pride and tenaciousness of ceremony due to his rank rendered him wholly unfit for the duties of a patriot chieftain.

YRIARTE, Don JUAN DE, a learned archæologist, was a native of Teneriffe, and on going to Spain, he obtained the post of royal librarian at Madrid. He published "Palæographia Græca," &c. Died, 1771.

YRIARTE, Don THOMAS DE, an eminent Spanish poet, was born in 1750; studied at Madrid; held an official situation under the government; and was editor of the Madrid Mercury. His chief works are, "Comedies;" "La Musica," a poem; "Literary Fables;" and "Moral Epistles." Died, 1794.

YSABEAU, or ISABEAU, ALEXANDER, a French revolutionary statesman, was a deputy from the department of Indre and Loire to the National Convention; voted for the death of Louis XVI.; was sent, in 1793, with Tallien, as an agent to Bourdeaux; was appointed, in 1798, commissary substitute of the Directory in the administration of the post office at Brussels, which he lost in 1814; and died, in obscurity and poverty, at Paris, in 1832.

ZABARELLA, FRANCESCO, a distinguished Italian ecclesiastic, was born at Padua, in 1329. He was an eminent professor of the canon law; and arrived, successively, at the dignities of bishop of Padua, archbishop of Florence, and a cardinal. He took a prominent part in the council of Constance, and was the author of a variety of learned and elaborate treatises on matters connected with ecclesiastical policy. Died, 1417.

ZABARELLA, JAMES, an astrologer, was of the same family as the cardinal, and born at Padua, in 1533. He wrote "Commentaries on Aristotle," &c. Died, 1580.

ZABAGLIA, NICHOLAS, an Italian architect, was born at Rome, in 1674, and displayed such mechanical abilities while employed as a carpenter at the Vatican, that he was appointed architect of St. Peter's. Died, 1730. He invented the method of transferring fresco paintings from the plaster.

ZACCARIA, FRANCESCO ANTONIO, a learned Jesuit, born at Venice, in 1714. He wrote "The Literary History of Italy," 14 vols.; "Literary Annals of Italy," 3 vols.; "The Lapidary, and Numismatic Institution," 2 vols.; "Library of Ancient and Modern Literary History," 6 vols., &c. Died, 1795.

ZACCHIAS, PAOLO, a medical writer of the 17th century, was born at Rome, in 1584; became physician to pope Innocent X.; and wrote several professional treatises. Died, 1639.

ZACHARIA, JUSTUS FREDERIC WILLIAM, a German poet, was born at Frankenhansen, in Thuringia, in 1726; studied at Leipzig; and was appointed professor of poetry in the Caroline college at Brunswick. His poetical works are distinguished by a lively metric turn, and form 6 vols. 8vo. Died, 1777.

ZACUTUS LUSITANUS, a Portuguese physician, born in 1578. He was educated as a Christian, though born of Jewish parents; but after having practised twenty years at Lisbon with great reputation, he became alarmed at the decree of exile issued by Philip II. against the Jews, in 1625, and fled to Amsterdam, where he embraced the faith of his ancestors. He wrote several medical works; and died in 1642.

ZAIONCZEK, JOSEPH, a Polish general, was born in 1732, at Kaminieck. In the diets from 1786 to 1792, he exposed the cause of his country's freedom, and was among the foremost who fought for it in 1792 and 1794. He commanded at Praga, when the suburb of Warsaw was taken by assault. Being made prisoner, and sent to the fortress of Josephstadt, he remained there till after the death of the empress Catharine; when, on being liberated, he entered into the French army, and was in active service from 1797 till 1812, in the various campaigns of Italy, Egypt, Prussia, Poland, and Russia. When the congress of Vienna assigned Poland to Russia, the emperor Alexander conferred on him the office of viceroy, with the title of prince. With these favours the patriotism of Zaiouczek vanished, and he became the devoted slave of the sovereign who had exalted him. He died in 1825.

ZAKRZEWSKI, N., a deputy of Posen, born about 1767; a brave and liberal Pole, who, in 1792 and 1794, distinguished himself among his popular countrymen in their efforts to shake off the yoke of Russia. On the Russians being driven out of Warsaw in 1794, he was appointed president of the National Council; but when that city fell into the hands of Suwarrow, the impregnable Catharine caused him to be arrested, and imprisoned, with Mostowski, Potocki, and other patriots, at St. Petersburg, where he remained till the accession of the emperor Paul set him at liberty.

ZALEUCUS, a renowned legislator of the Locriana, who flourished about 500 B. C. Having made a law to punish adulterers with the loss of sight, he refused to exonerate his own son when convicted of the crime, but proved the strength of his paternal feelings, by submitting to the loss of one of his own eyes, instead of exacting the penalty of both from the offender.

ZAMBECCARI, COUNT FRANCESCO, a celebrated Italian aeronaut, born at Bologna, in 1736. His experiments and researches were chiefly directed to the means of guiding balloons in the air, by availing himself of currents at different heights, by employing cars, and by the occasional diminution and augmentation of the gas. He perished in making one of these experiments in 1812, the balloon which conveyed him having entangled itself in a tree, and caught fire.

ZAMBECCARI, JOSEPH, a learned Florentine physician, of the 17th century, whose

ZAMOSKI, JOHN, a distinguished Polisher in the 16th century. After studying at Paris and Padua, and becoming rector of the university at the latter city, he returned to Poland, in 1763, and was one of the ambassadors sent to Paris to offer the Polish crown to the duke of Anjou, afterwards Henry III. of France. When Stephen Batori came to the throne, he gave his niece in marriage to Zamoski, whom he also made chancellor of the realm and general of his armies. He distinguished himself as a warrior, and rescued from the Muscovite yoke many of the Polish provinces. He also founded colleges, and patronized the arts; and at his death, in 1605, he was honoured with the title of defender of his country and the protector of the sciences.

ZANCHIUS, BASIL, a learned ecclesiastic, was born at Bergamo, in 1501. He became a canon regular, and was made keeper of the Vatican library; but ended his days in prison, on a charge of heresy, in 1580.

ZANCHIUS, JEROME, was born at Alzano, in 1516; and having formed a close intimacy with the celebrated Peter Martyr, while they were canons regular of St. Giovanni di Laterano, the conversation and example of this distinguished convert to the reformed church ultimately produced such an effect on the mind of Zanchius, as induced him to throw off the monastic habit and abjure the Romish faith. He was accordingly under the necessity of quitting Italy, and, after seeking refuge first at Geneva, and next at Strasburg and Châvenna, he accepted the divinity professorship at Heidelberg, in 1548; where he settled under the immediate patronage of Frederic III., elector palatine, at whose instigation he composed his great treatise against Antinomianism. The death of this prince, in 1575, occasioned his resignation, and he removed to Newstadt; but he returned to Heidelberg in 1586, and died there in 1590. His treatise "On the Doctrine of Predestination" has been translated into English by Dr. Toplady.

ZANICHELLI, JOHN JEROME, a celebrated Italian physician and natural philosopher, was born at Modena, in 1662. He pursued his scientific researches with great assiduity, undertaking many journeys, making collections of curious fossils, shells, &c., and publishing various works. Died, 1729.

ZANOTTI, FRANCISCO MARIA, a mathematician, was born at Bologna, in 1692, and became librarian, secretary, and president of the academy of his native city. He was at first a Cartesian; but afterwards became a zealous defender of Newton's system. He was a good Latin and Italian poet. Died, 1777.

ZAPPI, GIAMBATISTA FELICE, an Italian lawyer and poet, was born in 1667, and died in 1719. His sonnets have been greatly admired. The poetical talents of his wife FAUSTINA, who was the daughter of the celebrated Carlo Maratti, rivalled those of her husband.

ZARCO, JOHN GONZALES, a Portuguese

navigator of the 15th century. He discovered the islands of Porto Santo and Madeira; and was made governor of a part of the latter island, where he founded Funchal.

ZAZIUS, ULRIC, a learned professor of law at Friburg, in the 16th century. Among his principal works are, "Intellectus Legum singulares;" "De Origine Juris;" "Tractatus de Judiciorum Infantibus baptizandis;" and "Epitome in Usus Feudales." Died, 1533.

ZEA, DON FRANCISCO ANTONIO, one of the founders and vice-presidents of the republic of Columbia, was born in 1772, at Antioquia, in New Grenada. In 1820 he arrived in England on a diplomatic mission, and remained here as the agent of the Columbian government till his death, in 1822.

ZENDRINI, BERNARD, an eminent Italian mathematician, particularly excelling in the knowledge of hydraulics, was born at Savio, in 1679, and settled at Venice as a physician. His profound knowledge of hydraulics obtained for him the appointment of chief engineer to the Venetian republic, with the superintendence of all the rivers, ports, &c. He was also employed by the Austrian government, and the republic of Lucca; and many works of great importance were executed by him. Died, 1747.

ZENO, of Elea, a Greek philosopher, was born a.c. 495, at Elea, in Magna Græcia, and was a disciple of Parmenides. The invention, or at least the development, of dialectics, is ascribed to him. His native city having fallen under the dominion of a despot, he endeavoured to deliver it, but failed; and, being put to the torture, he is said to have bitten off his tongue, in order to prevent himself from betraying his companions.

ZENO, founder of the Stoic sect, was born about a.c. 362, at Citium, in the Isle of Cyprus, and quitted mercantile pursuits to become a philosopher. After having received the lessons of Crates, Stilpo, Xenocrates, and Polemon, he himself opened a school of philosophy in the Stoa, or porch, whence his followers acquired the name of Stoics. His integrity was so great, that the Athenians entrusted him with the keys of the citadel, and honoured him with a crown of gold and a statue of brass. He taught for nearly fifty years, lived to the age of ninety-eight, and then strangled himself, a.c. 264.

ZENO, NICHOLAS AND ANTHONY, two celebrated Venetian navigators of the 14th century, to whom the discovery of America, prior to the voyage of Columbus, has been attributed. Washington Irving, however, considers that they merely visited Greenland, and that the rest of their story is a fabrication.

ZENO, APOSTOLO, the father of the Italian opera, was born at Venice, in 1669. He established the academy of the Amisato at his native city, in 1696, and commenced, in 1710, the celebrated periodical work called "Il Giornale de Letterati." He wrote "Observations on the Italian Histor-riana," 2 vols. 4to.; and his dramatic works were printed in 1744, in 11 vols. Died, 1750.

ZENOBIA, queen of Palmyra, one of the most illustrious women ever invested with royalty, was instructed by the celebrated Longinus, and spoke the Latin, Greek, and Syrian languages with fluency. She was married to Odenatus, king of Palmyra, in whose labours of war and government she had participated, and after whose death she assumed the sovereignty. But, on the accession of Aurelian, that warlike prince marched against her, and laid siege to Palmyra, which she defended to the utmost extremity; but, in an attempt to escape, was taken, and carried to Rome to grace his triumph; and died there, in private life, about the year 300.

ZEUXIS, a celebrated painter of antiquity, was a native of Heraclea, believed to have been born about B.C. 497, and died B.C. 400. He brought to perfection the management of light and shade, and is allowed to have excelled in colouring. He gained such immense wealth by his pictures, that at last he ostentatiously gave them away, on the ground that no attainable price was equal to their real value.

ZIEGENBALG, BARTHOLOMEW, a celebrated Protestant missionary, who was sent to India in 1706; visited the territories of the great Mogul; and returned to Copenhagen in 1815. After completing a dictionary of the Malabar language, he visited England, and embarked for India, under the direct countenance of the East India company, in 1816. While he was actively engaged in his pious labours, he was attacked with a fatal disease, and died in 1819.

ZIETEN, JOHN JOACHIM VON, a Prussian general, who distinguished himself greatly in the seven years' war, particularly at the battle of Prague, and the storming of the heights of Torgau. Born, 1669; died, 1788.

ZIMMERMANN, JOHN GEORGE, a celebrated physician, was born at Brugg, in the canton of Berne, in 1736. His writings recommended him to the friendship of the king of Prussia, and he was appointed, by the regency of Hanover, physician to his Britannic majesty. On the breaking out of the French revolution, Zimmermann wrote zealously against the illuminati, and took pains to form societies for the purpose of counteracting them. The principal of his works, the "Treatise on Solitude," and "Essay on Natural Pride," have been translated into English. While his mind was in a state of agitation from these causes, the approach of the French towards Hanover in 1794, almost subverted his reason. He could think of nothing but the pillage of his house and ruin of his fortune, and under the morbid irritation, literally wasted away, and died in 1795.

ZIMMERMANN, EBERHARD AUGUSTUS WILLIAM VON, a German naturalist, was born at Weitzten, in 1743; studied at Göttingen and Leyden; and obtained the professorship of natural philosophy at the Caroline college at Brunswick. His first work was a treatise on the "Analysis of Curves;" and in 1777 he published "Specimen Zoologiæ," the outline of his "Geographical History of Man and Quadrupeds," 2 vols. He visited England three times, and printed here, in 1787, his "Political Survey of the present State of Europe;" and he subsequently employed his pen in opposing the revolutionary statesmen of France: for which he was ennobled by the emperor Leopold II. After this he published several geographical works; one of the best of which, was a "General Survey of France and of the United States of America," 2 vols. Died, 1815.

ZINCKE, CHRISTIAN FREDERIC, a celebrated painter in enamel, was born at Dresden, about 1684. He came to England in 1706; studied under Bolt, whom he far surpassed; and was patronized by the royal family. Died, 1767.

ZINZENDORFF, NICHOLAS LOUIS, count, a German, chief of the sect of Herrabstern, which he introduced into England by the title of Moravians, where several congregations of them still remain. He was born at Dresden, in 1700; and died in London, in 1760.

ZISCA, JOHN, a famous Bohemian patriot, who defended his country against the emperor Sigismund, and performed prodigies of valour after he had lost both his eyes. He headed the sect of the Hussites after the death of John Hus; and died in 1424.

ZOEGA, GEORGE, an eminent Danish archeologist, who resided for many years at Rome, as consul for Denmark, and was much esteemed by Pius VI. Among his works are, a treatise "De Origine et Usu Obeliscorum;" "Numi Egyptii;" and the "Ancient Basal Reliefs of Rome." Born, 1755; died, 1809.

ZOILUS, a Thracian rhetorician, who lived in the third century before the Christian era, and whose hyper-criticisms on the works of Homer, Aristotle, Plato, and others, have given him a very unenviable distinction. So severe and indiscriminate, indeed, were his censures, that his name has become a by-word, designative of illiberal and captious pretenders to criticism.

ZOLLIKOFER, GEORGE JOACHIM, an eminent Swiss divine, born at St. Gall, in 1730. He was educated at Bremen, and Utrecht; after which he became, successively, pastor to congregations at Marten, Monstein in the Orisons, Isenberg, and Lelpaic; distinguishing himself at each place by great purity of character, eloquence, and general abilities. His "Devotional Exercises" and Sermons have been translated into English.

ZONARAS, JOHN, a Greek historian, who compiled a "Chronicle, or Annals from the Creation to A.D. 1118." He was also the author of "Commentaries on the Apostolic Canons."

ZONCA, VICTOR, an able mathematician of Italy, in the 17th century, who published a collection of curious inventions in mechanics, entitled "Novo Teatro di Machinali ed edifici."

ZOPPO, MARK, an historical and portrait painter, was born at Bologna, in 1451. He was the disciple of Andrew Mantegna, whose style he imitated. Died, 1517.

ZOPYRUS, one of the courtiers of Darius, the son of Hystaspes. It is asserted, that he cut off his nose and ears at the siege of Babylon, and went over to the Babylonians, pretending that the Persians had thus inhumanly treated him. Thinking he would be stimulated by revenge, they gave him the command of their army, which he treacherously betrayed to Darius.

ZOROASTER, a celebrated Eastern philosopher. The history of Zoroaster is involved in much obscurity; some asserting that there was but one of that name, the Zerdusht of the Persians, while others speak of several, and carry the name back to the patriarchal ages. The most credible supposition is, that there was a Zoroaster, a Perso-Median, in the time of Darius Hystaspes, and also another who lived at a more remote period, and who taught the Babylonians astronomy. Zoroaster, or Zerdusht, was the reputed founder, but more truly reformer, of the Magian religion, and lived under the reign of Darius Hystaspes. He is said to have predicted the coming of the Messiah in plain and express words; and that the wise men of the East, who came to worship our Saviour on account of his star, were his disciples.

ZOUCH, RICHARD, an eminent civilian, born at Anstey, in Wiltshire, about 1590. He was educated at Winchester and New college, Oxford; became principal of St. Alban's hall, warden of the cinque ports, and judge of the admiralty; wrote numerous works, in Latin, on civil, military, and maritime jurisprudence; and died in 1660.

ZOUCH, Dr. Thomas, a divine and biographer, was born at Sandal, in Yorkshire, in 1727; received his education at Trinity college, Cambridge; became rector of Scrayingham and prebendary of Durham; refused the bishopric of Carlisle, in 1768, on account of his advanced age; and died in 1816. Among his works are, "The Crucifixion," a Saxonian prize poem; "An Inquiry into the prophetic Character of the Romans;" Memoirs of Sir Philip Sidney, Dean Sudbury, Sir George Wheeler, &c.

ZRINYI, NICHOLAS, a Hungarian poet, of the 17th century; author of an epic poem, in fifteen books, called the "Zrinyas, or the Syren of the Adriatic;" which, though rude and monotonous, has been praised for its religious feeling and patriotic spirit.

ZUCCARELLI, FRANCIS, a celebrated Italian painter, born at Florence, in 1710. He came to England about 1732, and met with such encouragement, that he saved a handsome independence, and returned to his own country, where he died in 1788.

ZUCCHERO, TADDEO, an eminent Italian painter, born at Urbino, in 1529, who attained to great proficiency in the art, and died in his twenty-seventh year.—His younger brother, FEDERICO, born in 1543, resided several years in England, where he grew into high repute, and painted the portrait of queen Elizabeth. Previous to his coming to this country, he had given great offence to pope Gregory XIII. by caricaturing several distinguished persons connected with the papal court; but his friends in England succeeded in restoring him to favour at Rome; and on his return, he established an academy of painting in that city, which he continued to superintend till his death in 1609.

ZUMALACARREGUI, THOMAS, Don, a distinguished Spanish military commander, first entered the army as a guerilla officer, under Mina, when the French invaded Spain; but being opposed in politics to the new constitutional government, he took an early opportunity of joining the army of the Faith under Quesada; and, on the rising of the Navarrese, became general-in-chief of the troops and partisans attached to the cause of Don Carlos. In this service he displayed the greatest skill and bravery, performing the most brilliant exploits, and keeping in check the regular army of Donna Maria, which, under various generals, was sent to oppose him. Born at a village near Villafranca, 1780; died, from a wound he received in battle, 1835.

ZUMBO, GASTANO JULIO, a celebrated modeller in wax, was born at Syracuse, in Sicily, in 1656. His profound knowledge of anatomy, combined with his skill in executing his works in coloured wax, obtained the admiration of connoisseurs. Some of his specimens represent, with astonishing accuracy, the different stages of decomposition which take place in the human body. He died at Paris, in 1701.

ZURITA, JEROME, a Spanish historian, was a native of Saragossa. After having been employed in various offices at home, and on a mission to Germany, he was appointed historiographer of Arragon. Born, 1512; died, 1581.

ZURLAUBEN, BEAT FIDELIS ANTOINE JEAN DOMINIQUE, baron de la Tour Chailillon de, a Swiss officer and author. He was born at Zug, in 1750; rose to the rank of lieutenant-general; spent the latter part of his life in literary pursuits; and died in 1795. He wrote a "History of the Swiss and their Allies;" a "Military History of the Swiss in the French Service;" and a "Picturesque Tour in the Thirteen Cantons."

ZWINGLI, or ZUINGLIUS, ULRIC, one of the most enlightened and tolerant of the Protestant reformers, was born at Wilderhausen, in Switzerland, in 1484. In 1516 he was made preacher at Einsiedeln, and in 1518 he became rector of Zurich. He opposed indulgences in Switzerland at the same time that Luther did in Saxony, but he went farther in the work of reformation, particularly in simplifying the mode of worship, and explaining the doctrine of the eucharist. He showed a spirit far in advance of the age, raising his voice against the corruptions and abuses that had crept into the church, and declaring himself for the use of the Scriptures in their genuine form, without regard to the prescribed texts and lessons. In 1524 he had the gratification of seeing his doctrines adopted by the great council of Zurich; and his influence among the Swiss Protestants continued to be powerful during the remainder of his life. Open war having broke out between the catholic and protestant cantons, a battle ensued, in which Zwinglius was among the slain, Oct. 3, 1531.

SUPPLEMENT.

THE ART OF PLEASING IS THE SKILL OF CUTTING TO A THREAD BETWEEN FLATTERY AND ILL-MANNERS.

ACCUM, FREDERICK, an eminent operative chemist, was born at Buckelburg, in Westphalia, in 1760. He came to reside in England early in life, and was originally an assistant to Dr. Garnett, the first professor at the Royal Institution. He subsequently opened a shop in Compton-street, where by his lectures and experiments in chemistry he acquired considerable reputation; but having at length been detected in the fraudulent practice of mutilating many valuable books at the London Institution, where he had for many years lectured, he was obliged to quit the country, and he died at Berlin in 1838. Among his principal works are, "A System of Chemistry," 2 vols., 8vo.; a "Manual of Analytical Mineralogy," 2 vols., 12mo.; "Treatises on Gas Light, Chrysanthology," &c.; but that which attained the greatest popularity was on the "Adulterations of Food and Culinary Poisons," afterwards published under the whimsical title of "Death in the Pot."

ALTEN, General CHARLES, count, a brave and experienced officer, was born at Wilkenburg, in the kingdom of Hanover, in 1764, and began his career under the auspices of the court, having been appointed page of honour to George III. (the then elector), and in 1781 he received his first commission as ensign in the foot-guards of the electorate. He first distinguished himself in the operations of 1793, against the revolutionary troops of France, and continued to serve in the army of his native country till 1803, when the Hanoverian corps were totally disbanded, according to the capitulation of Lauenburg. His services were, however, only transferred to the British army; for in November of the same year we find him gazetted as baron Charles Alten, lieutenant-colonel commanding the first battalion of the king's German legion, of which he became full colonel in the year following. From that time till the end of the war this officer was almost constantly engaged; but merely to name the different battles in which his brigade took a part would carry us beyond our limits. He was at the taking of Copenhagen, and afterwards served under Sir John Moore, as a brigadier-general, in the fatiguing and arduous duties of the disastrous campaign which ended in the battle of Corunna. At Walcheren also, and at the siege of Flushing, he distinguished himself; and on his return to England in 1810, he was promoted to the rank of major-general, and placed in command of the south-west district. From this station, however, he was speedily removed, his brigade being destined for the operations of the Peninsula, where he served under marshal Beresford at the first siege of Badajoz, and at Albuera. In 1812 Wellington placed him at the head of the light division, which he commanded in the general actions of Salamanca, Vittoria, Pyrenees, Nivelle, Nive, Orthes, and Toulouse. Like that of many of his brave compeers, his active duty closed with the battle of Waterloo, and his services at the head of the 3rd division, during the memorable 16th, 17th, and 18th of June, will ever be classed among the most devoted and glorious on military record. He was now created a count; and when recovered from the dangerous wounds he had received, he took the command of the Hanoverian troops forming part of the army of occupation in France. In 1821 count Alten was nominated one of the ministers of state, and placed at the head of the war department in Hanover. This appointment he held till his death, which took place in April, 1840. Count Alten was a knight grand cross of the English order of the Bath, and was honoured with many foreign orders by the different allied powers.

AQUADO, M., Marquis DE LAS MARIAS DEL GUADALQUIVER, a native of Spain, who as an adroit speculator in the Spanish and French funds, became possessed of enormous wealth. In early life he embraced the military profession, and in 1808 was a captain of dragoons. In the service of Joseph Buonaparte. After the war of independence was over he went to Paris, and supported himself by selling wine in the rue Jean Jacques Rousseau; but from this situation he emerged, in a lucky hour, by having the boldness to take advantage of the depressed state of Spanish stock; of which, as the agent of the Spanish government, he became the sole holder, and was thus enabled to dictate his own terms to those speculators who had calculated on a considerable fall in the nominal quotation. From that time forward his career was one of unbounded success; and it is said that his property at his death amounted to fifty millions of francs, all of which had been acquired by operations in the public funds since the year 1823. He formed a very fine gallery of pictures, statues, &c., and among the latter is Canova's celebrated statue of the Magdalen, which he purchased for 63,000 francs, and is said to have bequeathed it to the parish church of Notre Dame de Lorette, in Paris. Having returned to Spain in 1841 for the purpose of inspecting some valuable mines in the province of Asturias, of which he had become the purchaser, he was seized with apoplexy while on his route, and shortly after died.

ARGYLL, GEORGE WILLIAM CAMPBELL, 6th duke of, was the second son of John, the 5th duke, a field-marshal of England, by Elizabeth, widow of the 6th duke of Hamilton, and, previous to her first marriage, celebrated as one of "the three beautiful Miss Gennings," of whom so much mention is made by Horace Walpole and other writers of his time and class. In 1790 the subject of this article was returned to parliament for St. Germains in Cornwall, and sat until the dissolution of that parliament in 1796, during which time he was also colonel of the Argyll regiment of Infantry fencibles. On the death of Douglas, duke of Hamilton, he succeeded to a British peerage as baron Hamilton of Hameldon, in the county of Leicester, and, in 1806, on the death of his father, to the dukedom of Argyll. In the following year he was made vice-admiral of the western coast and islands of Scotland, the Orkneys being excepted. His grace usually voted with the Whig party, but he did not often speak, or, in fact, take any considerable part in the politics of the day. Uniting the home-loving spirit of a feudal chief with the sound views and practical information of a modern agriculturist, his grace passed very much of his time at Inverary Castle in Argyleshire, benefiting equally himself and his numerous and attached tenantry by the active and intelligent part that he took in the management of his extensive estates. The cruel and unfeeling practice adopted by some other Highland proprietors, of sending the native peasantry into exile, in order to turn their farms into sheep-walks to be let at higher rents, met with no encouragement from the duke. On one occasion, an agent, whose success in other quarters emboldened him to wait on the duke and press the subject, represented to him that if the inhabitants of the fertile and pleasant island of Tiree were removed to America, or elsewhere, a lease of the whole of it could be immediately disposed of to a wealthy grazier, who would give a greatly advanced rent. To this the duke instantly replied, "No, I will never expel one of them. It was from among those Islanders that I raised the men who procured me my captain's commission and formed the company I commanded under it, and the attachment they have shown me shall never be repaid by me but with my utmost regard and protection." In the year 1810 his grace married the lady Caroline Elizabeth Villiers, daughter of the earl of Jersey. This lady had formerly been married to the marquis of Anglesey, by whom she had several children, but the parties had been divorced. By the duke of Argyll she had no family. His grace, at the time of his death, was a privy-councillor, keeper of the great seal of Scotland, heritable master of the royal household in Scotland, keeper of the Scottish regalia, lord lieutenant, vice admiral of the coast, and hereditary sheriff of Argyleshire, an official trustee of the British Museum, and lord steward of Her Majesty's household, in which last high office he succeeded the marquis of Wellesley in 1833. Dying without issue, he was succeeded by his brother, lord John Campbell. Born, Sept. 1768; died, Oct. 21, 1840.

ARNOLD, Rev. THOMAS, D.D., head master of Rugby school, and professor of modern history in the university of Oxford, was born at Cowes, in the Isle of Wight, and educated at Winchester and Corpus Christi college, Oxford. Dr. Arnold was a most accomplished scholar; a successful instructor of youth, and an author of sterling value. In proof of the latter it is necessary only to mention his History of Rome (unfinished), and his edition of Thucydides. He also published various pamphlets on political subjects, and the Lectures delivered by him at Oxford in his capacity of professor of modern history. From the time of his appointment to the head-mastership at Rugby, in 1828, the school, which had previously been at a low ebb, rose rapidly in public estimation, and at his death contained about 370 boys, including those on the foundation. Died June, 1842, in the 47th year of his age.

ASHE, ANDREW, a celebrated musician, whose superior skill as a flutist is well-known, was a native of Ireland, but acquired his earliest fame at Brussels, where he was the rival of the noted Sieur Vanhulk. He, however, returned to his native country in 1790, and performed at the Rotunda concerts in Dublin, till the late Mr. Salmon introduced him to London, in 1793, at his concerts in Hanover-square, which soon established him as the reigning favourite. He was afterwards appointed principal flute at the Opera, and in 1810 was elected director of the Bath concerts, which he conducted with great ability many years. Died, April, 1838.

ATTWOOD, THOMAS, an eminent musician and composer, born in London, in 1767, was the son of a coal-merchant, and commenced his musical education under Dr. Nares, in the choir of the chapel-royal. When he was about sixteen, he was appointed to perform at Buckingham-house, before the royal family; and so pleased the prince of Wales (afterwards George IV.) that he provided him a handsome income out of his own private purse. In 1783 he set out for Naples, and after studying for a time with Filippo Cioque and Latilla, he proceeded to Vienna, in order to have the advantage of Mozart's instruction. He made great progress during his stay with that celebrated master; and, according to the testimony of Kelly, (in his "Reminiscences") Mozart described him as his favourite scholar, observing, "Attwood is a young man for whom I have a sincere affection and esteem; he conducts himself with great propriety, and I feel much pleasure in telling you, that he partakes more of my style than any scholar I ever had, and I predict that he will prove a sound musician." On the marriage of his royal patron, Attwood was chosen the musical instructor of the princess. In 1796 he was appointed organist of St. Paul's cathedral, and composer to the chapel-royal; he also held the situation of organist at the chapel of the Pavilion, Brighton. On the coronation of George IV. he composed a much-admired anthem for the occasion; and he performed a similar gratifying task for his late majesty, William IV. His compositions consist of several dramatic pieces, numerous services and anthems, songs, glees, sonatas, and other pieces for the piano-forte. He died March 24, 1838, and was buried in St. Paul's.

BANNISTER, JOHN, an admirable comic actor, the son of Charles Bannister, well known as a singer and a wit, was born in London, in 1760. Having been favourably noticed by Garrick, he made his debut at Drury-lane theatre, as "Master J. Bannister," when twelve years of age; he then quitted the boards for a time, but obtained a permanent engagement in 1779. At first he aspired to tragedy, and gave it a decided preference; but it was so obvious that his talents lay in the opposite direction, that on the death of Edwin he at once supplied his place, giving proofs of first-rate powers, and establishing himself as a public favourite. To name all the various parts in which he excelled his contemporaries, would occupy too much of our space; but we have a vivid recollection of him in Sylvester Daggerwood, Linga, Trudge, the Three Singles, Bonadri, Dr. Pangloss, Job Thornberry, Colonel Feignwell, Walter in "The Children in the Wood," and many others; and we do not hesitate to pronounce, without disparagement to the living, that he never has had his equal. Being much afflicted with the gout, he retired from the stage in 1815: having had the good fortune to earn a competence by his profession, and the prudence to keep it. He died Nov. 8, 1836, aged 76, respected and beloved by all who knew him. Nature had done much for Bannister, physically as well as mentally: his face, figure, and voice were excellent; his spirits exuberant; and an open manly countenance was a faithful index to the heart of "Gentleman Jack."

BAKKER, EDMUND HENRY, an eminent classical scholar, and one of the most industrious of modern writers. To the "Classical Journal" during twenty years of its publication, he contributed one or more articles to every number save the first and second. The "British Critic," and "Monthly Magazines" were almost equally favoured by him, and these articles, chiefly on recendite points of philology and antiquities, were his mere vulga delicia, with which he amused the intervals of his more serious labour of editing Stephens's "Thesaurus Lingue Græcæ," a gigantic labour, in which it was his aim "to introduce whatever materials the lapse of two centuries and a quarter could furnish for the improvement of Greek lexicography." Besides his greater work, he edited Prolegomena to Homer, Lempriere, and other school books. Born, 1784; died, 1839.

BARNES, SIR EDWARD, a lieutenant-general in the British army, (which rank he attained in 1825), and at the time of his death was M.P. for Sudbury. He served on the staff in Spain and Portugal; commanded a brigade at the battles of Vittoria, Pyrenees, Neville, Nive, and Orthes; and was severely wounded at Waterloo. For his services on that occasion he received the foreign orders of Maria Theresa and St. Anne; in 1831 he was appointed commander-in-chief in the East India, and he was afterwards governor of Ceylon. Died, 1838.

BARNES, REV. FRANCIS, D.D., for fifty years master of St. Peter's college, Cambridge, having been elected in 1788. He also held the professorship of casuistry. Died, aged 94, May 1, 1838.

BARNES, THOMAS, a gentleman of first-rate literary ability, and principal editor of "The Times," which journal owes much of its celebrity and influence to the powerful political leaders that came from his pen, as well as to the rare skill and discrimination he evinced in the general control and adaptation of the articles furnished by his coadjutors, &c. Notwithstanding the share he necessarily took in the strife of politics, it is recorded to his honour that he retained the friendship of all who had once intimately known him, how much soever they might chance to differ on questions of public interest. Mr. Barnes was educated at Christ's Hospital and Pembroke college, Cambridge, where he took his B.A. and M.A. degrees. Died 1841, aged 55.

BASSANO, HUGUES BERNARD MARET, duke of, a celebrated French political writer and statesman, was the son of an eminent physician at Dijon. On the first outburst of the French Revolution he enthusiastically embraced its extremest principles, and published a paper under the title of the Bulletin de L'Assemblée, which he continued until a bookseller started the Moniteur, of which Maret was appointed editor, and which speedily became the official organ of the government. He became acquainted with Buonaparte just as that extraordinary man began to rise into celebrity and influence, and was placed by him in the important office of chef de division in the foreign office. In 1792 he was sent to England, ostensibly to secure the neutrality of the British government, but in reality to hoodwink that government until the moment should arrive at which it could be securely, as well as efficiently, assailed. But the English minister of that day was too clear sighted even for French diplomacy. Both Maret and the French ambassador, Chauvelin, were peremptorily ordered out of England; and the former, soon after his return home, was sent as ambassador to Naples, but was captured on his way thither by the Austrians, and detained as a prisoner until 1795, when he and the Marquis de Lemonville were exchanged with the French government for a daughter of the ill-fated Louis XVI. In 1796 the losses and annoyances he had sustained by his long detention as a prisoner, were very handsomely compensated by the great council of Milan, which voted him the sum of 6000*l*. Being decidedly attached to Buonaparte both by feeling and by policy, Maret took a bold and active part in the long and complicated intrigues which were set on foot for the overthrow of the Directory and the establishment of the Consulate; and when the success of those intrigues, he was made secretary to the consular council of state. Subsequently he was for some time private secretary to Buonaparte, to whose dictation, it is said, that not a few of his articles in the Moniteur were actually written. In 1811 he was made Duc de Bassano, and minister of foreign affairs; and in 1812 he conducted and signed the well-known treaties between France, Austria, and Prussia, preparatory to the fatal expedition to Russia. When the emperor was sent to Elba in 1814, the Duc de Bassano retired from public life, but immediately after the return of the emperor he joined him, and was very nearly being taken prisoner at Waterloo. On the utter ruin of Napoleon the duke was banished from France, but at the Revolution of July, 1830, he was recalled and restored to all the honours of which he had been deprived. In 1838 he was made minister of the interior, and president of the council, but the ministry of which he formed a part survived only three days. Born, 1738; died, 1830.

BATHURST, Right Rev. HENRY, bishop of Norwich, was born at Brackley, in Northamptonshire, in 1744; and educated at Winchester, and New college, Oxford. He was presented to the rectory of Witchingham, in Norfolk, in 1770; subsequently became dean of Durham; and, in 1805, was consecrated bishop of Norwich. In the House of Lords, Dr. Bathurst was a strenuous supporter of the Catholic claims; in his diocese, an exemplary prelate. He died April 3, 1837.

BAYLY, THOMAS HAYNES, a lyrical poet of some merit, and the author of several dramatic pieces, and one or two novels. Though very popular in his own day, he was far too light and merely amusing a writer to have a hold upon posterity; indeed, the majority of his writings are already rapidly passing into oblivion. Born, 1797; died, 1839.

BAYLEY, the Right Hon. Sir JOHN, a learned and upright judge, was called to the bar in 1792, and appointed a sergeant-at-law in 1796. In 1806 he was made one of the justices of the King's Bench, and received the honour of knighthood. He was a man of liberal education and enlarged notions; to a most benevolent heart he added the dignified manners of the gentleman, and a degree of professional erudition that ever placed him in the first rank among his judicial peers. Judge Bayley's work on "the Law of Bills of Exchange" has long been a standard book in the profession, and its value in the commercial world is universally acknowledged. On his retirement from the bench, in 1834, he was sworn a member of the privy council and created a baronet. He died at his seat near Sevenoaks, Oct. 10, 1841, aged 78.

BEATTY, Sir WILLIAM, M.D., F.R.S., physician to Her Majesty's fleet, and also to Greenwich Hospital. This gentleman had the melancholy duty of being officially present during the last moments of the hero of Trafalgar, an "Authentic Narrative" of whose death he published. He was knighted in 1831. Died March, 1842.

BEAUHARNOIS, HORTENSE EUGENIE, ex-queen of Holland, and duchess of St. Leu, was born at Paris, in 1753, being the daughter of viscount Beaumanois, who perished by the guillotine in 1793, by his wife Josephine, afterwards the consort of Napoleon. She was married to Louis Buonaparte in 1802, but it was an ill-starred union; and they separated in 1807, after she had given birth to three sons; the eldest of whom (Napoleon Charles), died in childhood; the second, (Napoleon Louis), was killed in an insurrection at Romagna, in 1832; and the youngest, (Charles Louis Napoleon), was the rash youth who made the ridiculous attempt to excite an insurrection at Strasburg, and who still more ridiculously attempted another feat of a somewhat similar character at Boulogne, in 1840. She died Oct. 6, 1837.

BEAUMONT, JOHN THOMAS BARBER, well known as the founder and many years managing director of the County Fire Office, &c. was born in London, in 1774, his paternal name being Barber. In his youth he manifested a strong desire to obtain eminence as a painter, in which he so far succeeded as to have the honour of being appointed miniature painter to the dukes of York and Kent. He afterwards became an author, and published a "Tour in Wales, besides several tracts upon the best mode of arming the population so as most effectually to repel the threatened French invasion; and he at length put in practice what he had so strenuously recommended to others, by organizing a matchless rifle corps, known by the name of the "Duke of Cumberland's Sharpshooters", and of which corps he was appointed, in 1803, captain commandant. In 1806 he established the Provident Institution, which gave rise to the various similar establishments, now better known as "savings banks", throughout the kingdom. He died in May, 1841, having bequeathed the bulk of his property to his children, except the sum of 10,000 to establish a philosophical institution in Beaumont-square, Mile-end.

BEDFORD, JOHN RUSSELL, 6th duke of Bedford, K.G., an English nobleman, distinguished even among his own distinguished race for practical patriotism, and a truly princely patronage of the fine arts, and every branch of industry which tends to the improvement of the social condition. A member of several learned societies, and eminently versed in science and fond of literature, he was no less attached to agriculture, to the improvement of which he devoted many years, and large sums of money. His extensive landed property enabled him to do this; and in addition to large annual sums distributed by his grace in actual and direct charity, still larger were expended in providing his numerous tenantry with comfortable habitations, which were let to them at the lowest possible rents. Of his liberality of expenditure, when any useful object was in view, some opinion may be formed from the fact, that he expended upwards of 40,000l. in rebuilding Covent-garden Market in such a style as to render it one of the greatest ornaments of that part of the metropolis. In politics, his grace was a Whig, but his whole course and character were such as to procure him the esteem of men of all parties, and to obtain for him emphatically the really honourable title of "a good old English gentleman." Born, 1766; died, 1839.

he came to London, and was soon distinguished as a popular lecturer on anatomy and surgery, at the academy founded by the celebrated Hunters in Windmill-street, where, as subsequently, when appointed a professor at the royal college of surgeons, the benches were crowded with attentive auditors. He was the author of many professional works of high repute, on anatomy, surgical operations, and the nervous system; all admirably illustrated from drawings made by himself. On the accession of William IV. he received the honour of knighthood. As in his professional career Sir Charles was respected for his great talents, so in private life he was admired for the bland simplicity of his manners. He died in April, 1842, aged 64.

BEECHEY, Sir WILLIAM, R. A., an eminent English portrait-painter. But he was not wholly confined to that branch of the art, having painted some historical compositions of more than common merit, especially his "Iris bearing to Somnus the command of Juno to warn Alectone by a dream of the fate of her husband Ceyx." But Sir William excelled in portrait-painting, to which, indeed, he chiefly confined himself, and in which he so greatly surpassed most of his contemporary artists in number. Died, aged 50 years, in 1830.

BERESFORD, Rev. JAMES, rector of Kibworth, Leicestershire, was born at Uppham, in Hampshire, in 1764, and received his education at the Charter-house, and Merton college, Oxford. This gentleman was the author of a variety of separate works, besides several excellent papers in the Looker-on, a periodical of considerable interest published in 1792-3; but the work which obtained for him the greatest celebrity, was the well-known humorous satire entitled "The Miseries of Human Life," &c., 2 vols. 8vo. This was an especial favourite with the public; and as it met with extraordinary success, found abundance of imitators. Died, Sept. 1840, aged 76.

BIRCH, SAMUEL, the "patriotic pastry-cook," who, for many years, played a distinguished part as a member of the corporation of London, was born in that city, in 1737, and succeeded his father in his well-established business in Cornhill. Ever foremost in the ranks of those who supported the measures of government under the administration of Mr. Pitt we find Mr. Birch; in 1797, when "the Isle was frightened from her propriety" by the threats of French invasion, the first to propose the measure of arming and training the inhabitants as volunteers; and though his motion met with a decisive negative at that time, yet the general adoption of such a measure was shortly after carried into effect, not merely in the metropolis, but throughout the kingdom; and he had the honour, successively, to become lieutenant, major, and lieutenant-colonel commandant of the first regiment of Loyal London Volunteers. But Mr. Birch was not merely a loyal subject, or, as those who dissented from his politics called him, a red-hot Tory; he was also a man of considerable literary attainments, and one who possessed the necessary powers of rhetoric to meet the democratic orators who, at that period, spouted forth their revolutionary doctrines in Guildhall. Yet, although attentive to business, and never unmindful of his position as a party man in politics, he found leisure to employ his pen in various walks of literature. In 1785 he published a work entitled "Consilia," consisting of remarks on life, and the conduct requisite to make life happy; next appeared his poem called "The Abbey of Amresbury; after which, at considerable intervals, he wrote the following dramatic pieces:—"The Mariners;" "The Packet Boat;" "The Adopted Child," a musical drama; and "Albert and Adelaide;" all of which were performed between 1792 and 1796. Mr. Birch was among the earliest and most active supporters of the Literary Fund Society, to which he continued attached till his decease; and had long been the senior member of its council. In 1814 he filled the civic chair, having served the office of sheriff three years before; but, finding the infirmities of age fast advancing, he resigned his alderman's gown in 1840. He died Dec. 10, 1841, aged 64.

BIRKBECK, GEORGE, M.D., president of the London Mechanics' Institute, was the son of a merchant and banker at Settle, in Yorkshire, where he was born in 1776. In his boyhood he displayed a strong inclination for those mechanical pursuits to which he afterwards became so devoted; but his friends having determined that he should embrace the medical profession, he first studied for this object at Leeds, then removed to London to become a pupil of Dr. Baillie, and subsequently went to Edinburgh to complete his education. At the age of twenty-one he was appointed professor of natural history in the Andersonian Institution of Glasgow; and having while there successfully established a mechanics' class, he was induced in 1822 to found the London Mechanics' Institution in Chancery-lane; to which society he generously lent 3,000*l.* for erecting a museum, lecture-room, &c. Of this institution Dr. Birkbeck was elected president; and from it nearly all the various mechanics' institutes throughout Great Britain have been established. As a physician he enjoyed a considerable share of reputation; as the promoter of mechanic arts, and as the warm friend of the industrious artisan, no man could possibly be more generally or more justly esteemed. He also numbered among his circle of friends the most eminent scientific and literary men of the day. Died Dec. 1, 1841.

BLAIR, Sir ROBERT, a general on the East India Company's Bengal establishment; entered the service as an ensign in 1773; and, by gradual promotion, rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and was appointed commandant of the 2nd Native Infantry, in 1798. In 1803 he joined Lord Lake's army, and commanded his regiment at the battles of Allypore and Delhi, and was present at the siege of Agra; of which garrison he afterwards had the command, as well as the charge of the newly conquered territory. In 1801 he obtained the rank of major-general; in 1812 he was placed on the staff of the Bengal army, and appointed to the command of Fort William; returned to England in 1817; subsequently rose to the rank of general; and died at Bath, in 1837, aged 82.

BLAND, MARIA THERESA, an actress and vocalist, was born at Caen, in Normandy, in 1770, and came to England with her parents, who were Italians, shortly after. When under five years of age she sang (as Miss Romanizi) at Sadler's Wells; obtained an engagement at Drury-lane theatre in 1789; and subsequently appeared as the heroine in the musical dramas written by Colman for his theatre in the Haymarket. In 1790 she was married to Mr. George Bland, brother to the celebrated Mrs. Jordan. She continued on the boards of Drury till that theatre was burnt, in 1809; and for many years delighted the lovers of simple melody with her strains at Vauxhall Gardens. Her latter years were clouded by a degree of mental imbecility which prevented her appearing in public; but in 1834, by the proceeds of a benefit which was granted to her at Drury-lane, together with a sum liberally given by the late lord Egremont, an annuity of 70*l.* was secured to her for life. Died, Jan. 1837.

BOADEN, JAMES, Esq., a dramatic author and critic. Educated for the law, he was, like many young men similarly situated, a great lover and frequenter of the theatre; and, like not a few other dramatists, he progressed from loving the stage to writing for it. His plays are numerous, and were successful when produced—his "Fontainville," for instance, produced him a handsome sum from the theatre, independent of a hundred guineas which the publishers gave him for the copyright—but we believe there is not one of them that now keeps possession of the stage. Far more important are his dramatic memoirs. In them he has left, probably, the very best record that the world can now ever hope to have of John Kemble, Mrs. Siddons, Mrs. Jordan, and Mrs. Inchbald. That of John Kemble was dedicated to George the Fourth, who, from personal intimacy with the great tragedian, was peculiarly well qualified to judge of the execution of the memoir, and who expressed his sense of it by presenting the author with a hundred guineas. His "Inquiry into the Authenticity of the various Pictures and Prints of Shakspeare," and a tract on "the Sonnets of Shakspeare," are also very valuable works. Born, 1783; died, 1839.

BOLLAND, Sir WILLIAM, one of the barons of the exchequer, was born in 1773, and received his education at Reading school, under Dr. Valpy, and at Trinity college, Cambridge. He was called to the bar in 1801; admitted one of the four common pleaders of the city of London in 1804; and in 1817 he was elected recorder of Reading, which office he held until appointed a baron of the exchequer in 1829. He was a member and one of the originators of the Roxburghe club, and is often mentioned by Dr. Dibdin among the most ardent admirers of the literature of the olden times. As a man, he was entitled to the highest praise; his benevolence, suavity of manner, and honourable principle, distinguishing his career both in public life and among his circle of private friends. As a judge, he was humane, attentive, and discriminating. Died, May 1840.

BOROWLSKI, Count, the celebrated Polish dwarf, who, although less than three feet in height, was of perfect symmetry, and attained the great age of ninety-eight. He had been prevailed upon by some of the clergy of Durham, who had casually seen him when on his "travels," forty years before his death, to take up his abode near that city, they engaging to allow him a handsome income for life. He spoke several languages, was generally well informed and witty; and his company was accordingly much courted by the gentry of Durham and its vicinity. Died, Sept. 1837.

BOWDITCH, Dr. NATHANIEL, F.R.S., president of the American academy of arts and science, and the most eminent scientific man in that hemisphere since Dr. Franklin, was a native of Boston; and, like his prototype, he rose from humble life, was self-educated, and at length arrived at the enviable distinction of being a philosopher of the first class. When twenty-three years of age he published his "Practical Navigator," a work of great merit; but his admirable translation of the "Mechanique Celeste" of La Place, with an elaborate commentary, was the production that raised him to the pinnacle of fame. This he completed in four thick quarto volumes, and it cost him 10,000 dollars. Died, 1838.

BRENTON, Captain EDWARD PELHAM, R.N., an officer of great merit, whose services at sea during the war were scarcely greater than those which he performed on shore and during peace. Gifted with great ingenuity, he made several mechanical improvements connected with his profession, of which naval men speak in the highest terms. Among these is a gun-boat, sharp both at stem and stern, and carrying her guns on a slide, which can be raised for fighting, or lowered for ballast, either advancing or sheering off. In peace, captain Brenton was the untiring advocate and liberal supporter of several of the most useful charities in the metropolis. Of one of these, "the Children's Friend Society," he was, in fact, the founder; and it is not too much to say, that to it hundreds of poor children owe their removal from the horrors of vice and want, to a life of virtuous exertion, and its concomitant—comfort and happiness. Captain Brenton was also very favourably known as an author, by his "Naval History of Great Britain, from 1783 to 1837," and a "Biography of Earl St. Vincent." Died, 1839.

BROKE, Rear-admiral Sir PHILIP BOWEN VERR, a gallant English officer, the eldest son of Philip B. Broke, Esq. of Nacton, Suffolk, was born in 1776, and commenced his naval career as a midshipman in 1792. After the usual initiation, during which he was present in several general engagements, he obtained the rank of commander in 1799, and post captain in 1801. The various services he subsequently performed

In different parts of the globe, though they were neither few nor unimportant, we shall not enter upon, in order to notice at more than our accustomed length, the far-famed action between his ship, the Shannon, of 38 guns, and the American frigate Chesapeake, mounting 40. Sir John B. Warren, the commander-in-chief of the blockading squadron on the American coasts, resolving to spend the winter at Bermuda, left Captain Broke in charge of the naval force stationed on the coasts of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick: but being relieved in the spring, he sailed to reconnoitre the port of Boston, by which he obtained the object of his wishes—a fair encounter with the American flag. This memorable battle was fought on the 1st of June, 1813. "After exchanging two of three broadsides, the enemy's ship (says Capt. Broke in his dispatch) fell on board of us, her mizen channels locking in with our fore-rigging. I went forward to ascertain her position; and, observing that the enemy were flinching from their guns, I gave orders to prepare for boarding;" and the result was, that in less than fifteen minutes from the commencement of the action "the American flag was hauled down, and the proud old British union floated triumphant over it." But so fierce was the encounter, that in this short time the Americans had 70 men killed, and 100 wounded; while the killed on board the British vessel amounted to 23, and the wounded to 56. In narrating this action, Mr. James, in his Naval History, says, "After those upon the fore-castle had submitted, Capt. Broke ordered one of his men to stand sentry over them, and sent most of the others aft, where the conflict was still going on. He was in the act of giving them orders to answer the fire from the Chesapeake's main-top, when the sentry called lustily out to him. On turning round, the captain found himself opposed by three of the Americans; who, seeing they were superior to the British then near them, had armed themselves afresh. Capt. Broke parried the middle fellow's pike, and wounded him in the face; but instantly received from the man on the pikeman's right a blow with the butt-end of a musket, which bared his skull, and nearly stunned him. Determined to finish the British commander, the third man cut him down with his broad-sword, and, at that very instant, was himself cut down by one of the Shannon's seamen. Capt. Broke and his treacherous foe now lay side by side; each, although nearly powerless, struggling to regain his sword, when a marine dispatched the American with his bayonet." It is almost needless to add, that the news of a victory so nobly gained, against such fearful odds—at a time when an opinion was gaining ground that our frigates were not a match for the large vessels (misnamed frigates) of the Americans—was hailed in England with every demonstration of national pride; and that rewards and complimentary congratulations attended the gallant author of it; who for his "distinguished zeal, courage, and intrepidity," was raised to the dignity of a baronet of Great Britain. He died

BRONSTED, PETER OLAV, a distinguished Danish philologist and antiquary, was born in 1780, entered the university of Copenhagen in 1796, and took the degree of doctor in philosophy in 1806. In company with his friend, Dr. Koes, who, like himself, was animated with a desire to become intimately acquainted with the relics of ancient Greece, he left Copenhagen; and they spent their first four years in Paris, Rome, and various other parts of Italy, in order to make suitable preparations for the prosecution of their journey. At Rome they were joined by three German travellers similarly bent, and in the autumn of 1810 the united company arrived at Athens, where they soon after met with two gentlemen from England, whose pursuits had the same in view. Mutually assisting each other, they made considerable progress in their researches, and in their excavations of the temples in Agina, &c., many fine monuments of ancient Greek art were discovered. On his return to Denmark he was assisted with pecuniary means by the government; and having been appointed diplomatic agent to the Papal court in 1816, he again repaired to Rome. He afterwards travelled through the Ionian Isles, Malta, and Sicily, for the purpose of prosecuting additional investigations; he subsequently made Paris his principal residence, coming occasionally to England; and in 1837 he visited his native country, where he received the honorary title of privy councillor of legislation. Several other marks of distinction were subsequently granted him, and in the year 1841 he was made rector of the university. The first part of his principal work, entitled "Travels and Researches in Greece," appeared in 1826, at Paris, simultaneously in the French and German languages; the second part in 1830. Various other works of a classical and antiquarian character, have also been produced by him. The chevalier Bronsted died at Copenhagen, in consequence of a fall from his horse, June 26, 1842, aged 61.

BROWN, Lieut.-general Sir THOMAS, an officer in the service of the East India Company, entered it as an ensign of infantry, in 1799. Gradually rising in rank, he was removed in 1798 to the 1st. cavalry, and sent into Oude against the rebels, when he had the honour of commanding the escort which conveyed Vizier Ally prisoner from Jeypoor through the Mahratta territory to the British camp at Futtehgurh. He attained the rank of major in 1800; that of lieut.-colonel in 1802; colonel in 1812; major-general in 1814, and lieut.-general and K.C.B. in 1823. He was almost constantly on active duty, and performed many valuable services to the Company; among the most arduous may be noticed his long and fatiguing pursuit of a popular marauding chieftain, named Gopal Sing, whose forces, after two years of incessant vigilance on the part of Colonel Brown were dispersed, and their leader surrendered. When the marquis of Hastings took the field against the Pindarries, he was appointed to command the centre division of the grand army, and being afterwards detached to the westward with a light force, chiefly cavalry, he took the towns of Rampoorah and Jawnd by assault. In 1622 he returned to England, and died at his residence at Thames Ditton, in May, 1638.

BRYDGES, SIR SAMUEL EGERTON, bart., a gentleman of versatile talents and erratic character, was born in 1762, at Wootton Court, in Kent, and was educated at the King's school, Canterbury, and at Queen's college, Cambridge; but, according to his own testimony, he neglected the studies most necessary to academical distinction, for the more congenial pursuits of poetry and the belles-lettres. In 1799, after the death of the late duke of Chandos, he induced his elder brother, the Rev. E. T. Brydges, to prefer a claim to the barony of Chandos, the consideration of which was long procrastinated; but at length, in 1803, the House of Lords decided against its validity. On the death of his brother, in 1807, Sir Egerton pertinaciously adhered to his favourite, though illusory notion, of obtaining a coronet; maintaining that, though defeated by parliamentary law, he could, when he pleased, assert his rights by common law—while he regularly added to the signature of his name,—"per legem Terræ, B.C. of S."—mezzing Baron Chandos of Sudely. He made several unsuccessful attempts to obtain a seat in parliament, but was ultimately (1812) returned for Maidstone, which borough he continued to represent about six years. In 1814 he was created a baronet; and in 1818, upon the loss of his seat in the House of Commons, he visited many parts of the continent. In 1826 he returned to England for two years, and took up his abode at Lee Priory, the seat of Col. Brydges Barrett, his elder son; at the expiration of which time, his affairs becoming inextricably embarrassed, he finally quitted his native land, and removed to Geneva, where he remained in great seclusion until his death. The literary labours of Sir Egerton Brydges were exceedingly multifarious; poetry, romance, politics, genealogical antiquities, and topography, were the principal; and in many he acquitted himself with great ability. That there was much of egotism, eccentricity, and presumption, combined with solid pretensions to learning, his whole career abundantly proves; yet we willingly quote from the tablet erected to his memory by his sons, that "there was enough of force in his genius, had there been a sufficient concentration in its efforts, to have accomplished the uttermost of his exalted ambition." It is said, that he wrote two thousand sonnets in the course of one year, some of which certainly possess very considerable merit. His abilities as a genealogist, topographer, and bibliographer, are attested by his "Censura Literaria Restituta," 10 vols.; "Theatrum Poetarum;" "Stemmata Illustrata;" "Britannic Bibliography;" "Lex Terræ;" &c. Besides these, he published the novels of "Mary de Clifford," "Arthur Fitz-Albin," "Coningsby," and "The Hall of Hellingsey;" "Imaginary Biography," 3 vols.; "Recollections of Foreign Travel," 2 vols.; "The Autobiography, Times, Opinions, and Contemporaries of Sir Egerton Brydges," 2 vols.; and numerous others; Independent of contributions to many periodicals on almost every imaginable subject. His death took place in September, 1837, in the 75th year of his age. Sir Egerton Brydges was twice married, and had a large family by each wife.

BUCKINGHAM AND CHANDOS, duke of, an English nobleman of great abilities, both as a scholar and politician, and a most munificent patron of literature and the arts. As a politician he for the most part maintained conservative principles, and in early life he was both an eloquent and a frequent speaker; but for many years previous to his death he was so much afflicted with gout as to be compelled to remain in retirement, where he found consolation under his suffering in the exercise of a literary and scientific taste, in which few men of his time excelled him. He was a firm friend to the agricultural interest, and his very numerous tenantry, and more especially the poorer among them have lost a sincere friend. Of the extent of the duke's patronage of the arts, some idea may be formed from the fact, that the sale of a part only of his vast collection of fine and rare engravings lasted for thirty days! Born, 1777; died, 1829.—A brief memoir of the duchess, whose lamented death happened three years previous to that of her noble husband, will be found in the early part of this volume.

BUONAPARTE, LUCIEN, prince of Canino, the next brother after Napoleon in birth, and after him, too, the ablest and most ambitious of the family. He was born at Ajaccio in 1775; and having quitted Corsica, with his family, in 1793, he became a commissary of the army in 1798, and soon afterwards was elected deputy from the department of Liamone to the Council of Five Hundred. It was here that he first distinguished himself by the energy of his manner, the fluency of his language, the soundness of his arguments, and his apparent devotion to the existing government. During Napoleon's absence in Egypt, he maintained a constant correspondence with him; and on his return, Lucien was the chief instrument of the revolution which followed. When the sentence of outlawry was about to be pronounced against his brother, he opposed it with all the force of his eloquence; and when he perceived that remonstrances were of no avail, he threw down the ensigns of his dignity as president, mounted a horse, harangued the troops, and induced them to clear the hall of its members. By his subsequent energy, coolness, and decision, he led the way to Napoleon's election as first consul, and was himself made minister of the Interior, in the room of La-place. But, great as were the services which Lucien had performed for his brother, the latter became jealous of his abilities, and feared his popularity. A coolness between them soon took place; and, with that cunning which marked so many of his actions, he took care to remove Lucien from the immediate scene of action, by sending him ambassador to Madrid. Having few to deal with at that court but imbeciles and traitors, he flattered or bullied as best suited the purpose of the day, and thereby drew immense sums from his mission, while he promoted the all-grasping views of France. In the spring of 1802 he returned to Paris, was outwardly reconciled with the first consul, and entered a second time upon the tribuneship. He had married, at an early age, the daughter of a wealthy inn-keeper; and his wife having been now some time dead, he united himself to one madame Joubertou, the widow of a stock-broker, a woman distinguished for her gallantries. This gave great offence to Napoleon, and was a severe blow to the system he had long contemplated of forming royal alliances for his relatives. He therefore used every means in his power to induce Lucien to consent to a dissolution of the marriage; but, to his honour be it recorded, he constantly spurned all the proposals that were made to him to sacrifice his wife. For several years he took up his residence in Rome, where he was a welcome visitor, having merited the gratitude of the pope by the zealous support he had given the concordat; and when, in 1807, he found that the enmity of his brother rendered his stay in that city no longer safe, he retired to an estate which he had purchased at Canino, and which his holiness had raised into a principality. It was not long, however, before he found that the emissaries of Napoleon were hovering round his retreat, and he fled secretly to Civita Vecchia; from which place he embarked in Aug. 1810, with the intention of proceeding to the United States. A storm threw him on the coast of Cagliari; but the king of Sardinia refused him permission to land: he was accordingly forced to put out to sea; and being captured by two English frigates, he was conveyed first to Malta, and afterwards (Dec. 18) brought to England. After a time he was permitted to purchase a beautiful estate near Ludlow, in Shropshire, where he spent three calm and peaceful years, completing, during that period, a poem upon which he had long meditated, entitled "Charlemagne, or, the Church Delivered." The peace of 1814 having opened his way to the continent, he returned to his old friend and protector, Pius VII. After the battle of Waterloo he urged the emperor to make a desperate stand for the throne; but the cause was hopeless; and Lucien, having retired to Italy, he devoted the remainder of his days to literature and the fine arts. He died at Viterbo, June 29, 1840.

BURGESS, Right Rev. THOMAS, the learned and venerable bishop of Salisbury, was born in 1736, at Odilham, in Hampshire, where his father carried on business as a grocer. He was educated at Winchester; obtained a scholarship at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, in 1775; and, by his talents and diligence, in a short period became logic reader and tutor of the college. He had by this time distinguished himself as a scholar of very considerable pretensions, by the publication of several able works; and he found a patron in Dr. Shute Barrington, who collated him, in 1787, to the prebend of Wilsford and Woodford, in Salisbury cathedral, and afterwards preferred him to a prebendal stall at Durham. His next advancement took place under the administration of Mr. Addington (who had been his fellow student at Winchester and Oxford), and who, unsolicited, conferred on him, in 1803, the vacant see of St. David's. From the moment of his elevation to the episcopal bench, he displayed the most devoted and exemplary attention to the concerns of his diocese; he planned and formed a society for the foundation of a provincial college for the instruction of ministers of the Welsh church; and the establishment at Lampeter stands as a noble monument of his activity and benevolence. On the death of Dr. Fisher, in 1805, he was translated to the bishopric of Salisbury; and throughout the twelve years of his episcopal duties in that diocese, he zealously contributed to promote the interests of those committed to his charge, no less by his unobtrusive charities, than by his public example in the prosecution of every useful work. Among his numerous works are editions of "Burton's Pentalogia;" and "Dawes's Miscellanea Critica;" "Considerations on the Abolition of Slavery;" an "Essay on the Study of Antiquities;" "First Principles of Christian Knowledge;" "Reflections on the Controversial Writings of Dr. Priestley;" "Emendationes in Suidam et Hesychium et alio Lexicographos Græcos," 4 vols.; "The Bible, and nothing but the Bible, the Religion of the Church of England;" with many others, theological, classical, and political. Bishop Burgess was mainly instrumental in founding the Royal Society of Literature, of which, in 1821, he became the first president; but in 1832, on account of his loss of sight, and other infirmities, he resigned the office in favour of the late lord Dover. He died, at Southampton, Feb. 19, 1837, and was buried in Salisbury cathedral. His valuable library, consisting of many thousand volumes, he bequeathed to St. David's college, Lampeter.

BURNES, Sir ALEXANDER, a lieutenant-colonel in the Indian army, and political president in the court of the Soojah at Cabool, was born at Montrose, Scotland, in 1805. Having, particularly distinguished himself at the Montrose academy, he obtained the appointment of cadet, and arrived at Bombay in 1821; and on account of his proficiency in the Persian and Hindostanee languages, was at first employed as an interpreter and translator. His regiment, the 21st native infantry, having been ordered to Bhoj in 1825, lieutenant Burnes joined it, and during the disturbances in Cutch was appointed quarter-master of brigade, though at the time he was under twenty years of age. His superior talents and zeal soon attracted the attention of the authorities, and he was speedily appointed Persian interpreter to a force of 8,000 men, assembled for the invasion of Scinde, under the command of colonel M. Napier of the 6th foot. In the following year he drew up an able and elaborate paper on the statistics of Wagur, for which he received the thanks of government and a handsome pecuniary reward; and he subsequently completed a valuable memoir on the eastern mouth of the Indus, which was followed by similar marks of approbation. In Sept. 1829, he was appointed to act as assistant to the political agent at Cutch, and was engaged in surveying the north-west frontier. Early in 1830 a present of horses having arrived at Bombay from the king of England, to be sent to the Maharajah Rungeet Singh, Lieut. Burnes was selected to proceed with them to Lahore, the capital of the Punjab country; he was also intrusted with presents to the Amers of Scinde; but though this was the ostensible object of his mission, the chief motive was to obtain full and complete information in reference to everything pertaining to the geography of the Indus. This extraordinary journey was performed amid delays, obstructions, and difficulties, but with admirable tact and perseverance; and the work recording these travels, which was published some little time after his return to England, in 1833, possesses the highest interest. To use his own words, he had "retraced the greater part of the route of the Macedonians; trodden the kingdoms of Porus and Taxiles; sailed on the Hydaspes; crossed the Indian Caucasus, and resided in the celebrated city of Balkh, from which Greek monarchs, far removed from the academies of Corinth and Athens, had once disseminated amongst mankind a knowledge of the arts and sciences, of their own history, and the world. We had beheld the scenes of Alexander's wars, of the rude and savage invasions of Genghis and Timour, as well as of the campaigns and revelries of Baber, as given in the delightful and glowing language of his commentaries. In the journey to the coast we had marched on the very line of route by which Alexander had pursued Darius, while the voyage to India took us on the coast of Mekran and the track of his admiral, Nearchus." The success of this work was almost unprecedented, and it was immediately translated into French and German; while its author received the honorary testimonials of several learned bodies, and was made F.R.S. Soon after his return to India in 1835, Lieut. Burnes, in acknowledgment of his diplomatic and other services, was knighted, and advanced to the brevet rank of lieutenant-colonel; and on the final restoration of the Shah Soojah, in Sept. 1839, he was appointed political resident at Cabool, with an annual salary of 3000*l*. But he was not long destined to fill the post which his merits had gained: for at the very outset of the insurrection in Cabool (Nov. 2, 1841), it was the melancholy fate of this enterprising and deserving officer—then only in his 37th year—to be assassinated, together with his brother, Lieut. Charles Burnes, and several others.

BUTLER, Dr. SAMUEL, bishop of Lichfield, a learned and most exemplary English divine. He was born at Kenilworth, in Warwickshire, and received his education at Rugby school, to which he was admitted in 1783. In 1792 he removed thence to St. John's college, Cambridge, where his course was rapid and brilliant, nearly, if not quite, without parallel, his prizes and distinctions far exceeding in number those obtained by any of his contemporaries. In 1798 he was appointed to the mastership of Shrewsbury school, and, about the same time he was selected for the arduous task of preparing a new edition of Æschylus for the university press. His learning and his indefatigable exertions soon procured for Shrewsbury a very high rank and reputation among our public schools; and it would take no small portion of our space merely to enumerate the distinguished men who have since passed thence to the universities. After receiving several minor promotions, he was, in 1836, promoted to the bishopric of Lichfield. Though a perfect martyr to ill health, he was a very voluminous author, but by far his most important literary labour, probably, indeed, the only one of permanent importance, is his edition of Æschylus, already mentioned. Born, 1774; died, 1840.

CAMDEN, JOHN JEFFREYS PRATT, marquis, K. G., &c. &c., was born in 1759, being the only son of Charles, first earl Camden, some time lord high chancellor of England. He was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge; and in 1790 was returned to parliament as one of the members for Bath; shortly after which he received the appointment of one of the tellers of the exchequer. In 1794 he succeeded his father in the peerage, and the year following he was made lord-lieutenant of Ireland. This, it will be recollected, was a period of great peril and difficulty, the whole country being in a state of rebellion, which it required the adoption of vigorous measures to arrest; and though his administration there was marked by prudence and decision, it appeared necessary that a military man should occupy his post, and in 1798 the marquis Cornwallis was appointed his successor. His lordship held various important situations; he was lord-lieutenant and custos rotulorum of the county of Kent; chancellor of the university of Cambridge; master of the Trinity House, which honourable post he resigned to his friend the duke of Wellington in 1837; a privy-councillor; governor of the Charterhouse, and of King's college, London; and one of the tellers of the exchequer. This lucrative office he held for sixty years; and during almost half that term he had patriotically resigned the large income arising therefrom, amounting in the whole to upwards of a quarter of a million of money! This patriotic act alone throws a lustre over the name and character of the noble marquis, which will be remembered long after the splendour attached to his rank and honours shall have faded from the memory. For his eminent services to the state, his lordship was created marquis Camden and earl of Brecknock in 1812. He died Oct. 8, 1840, being in his 82d year.

CARLISLE, Sir ANTHONY, one of the most distinguished anatomists and physiologists of the age, was born at Stillington, Durham, in 1768, and commenced his professional studies at York, under the care of an uncle, who soon dying, he was transferred to Mr. Green, founder of the hospital in the city of Durham. He thence proceeded to London, and became a resident pupil of Mr. H. Watson, a surgeon of Westminster hospital, and one of the court of examiners of Surgeons' Hall, a man of the first rank in his profession. In 1793, that gentleman dying, Mr. Carlisle succeeded him in the hospital, and speedily distinguished himself, as much by his invariable humanity to the suffering poor, as by his skill. A desire to investigate the laws of nature appears in all his labours, whether in the field of comparative anatomy, his researches into many branches of natural history, or his unwearied labours in experimental philosophy. As a surgeon his numerous pupils will bear testimony to his profound knowledge in his profession, and his skill and patience as an instructor. As a man he was upright in his principles, a promoter of the happiness of his kind, and undaunted in the avowal of his opinions. He was senior surgeon to the Westminster hospital, one of the council and court of examiners of the Royal College of Surgeons, F.R.S., &c. Died, Nov. 2, 1840.

CEVELLOS, the Chevalier de, formerly minister of foreign affairs for Spain, and successively ambassador at Naples, Lisbon, Vienna, and London. It was he who published the celebrated manifesto when Napoleon invaded the Peninsula, and which at the time made a great impression throughout Europe. Born, 1763; died, 1838.

CHANTREY, Sir FRANCIS, R.A., F.R.S., F.S.A. &c., a sculptor of first rate eminence, was born of humble village parents, at Norton, near Sheffield, in 1761. When a mere child he discovered considerable talent in drawing and modelling; and during his apprenticeship with Mr. Ramsey, a carver and gilder at Sheffield, the whole of his leisure hours were most assiduously devoted to the study and practice of his favourite pursuits. Having made a compensation to his master for the remaining term of his apprenticeship, he paid a short visit to London, and attended the school of the Royal Academy. He then returned to Sheffield, where, at 20 years of age, he may be said to have commenced business, but his career of fame and fortune was not begun until 1809, when he received an order from Mr. Alexander, the architect, for four colossal busts, of Howe, St. Vincent, Duncan, and Nelson, for the Trinity-house, and for the Greenwich Naval Asylum. In 1811 he had six excellent busts in that year's exhibition, and was also the successful candidate for a statue of George III. for the city of London. From this period he was unremitting in his efforts, and continually successful; and, among the admirable productions of his chisel, there appeared, in 1817, that exquisite group of "The Sleeping Children" (the daughters of the Rev. W. Robinson) in Lichfield cathedral; universally acknowledged as "images of artless beauty and innocent and unaffected grace." Orders now crowded in upon him in number beyond his ability to execute; and as it would be impossible in our limits to enumerate the whole, the mention of a few of the leading busts and statues must suffice. Among them we notice his busts of Lord Castlereagh, Sir Walter Scott, the poets Wordsworth and Southey, Mr. Canning, John Rennie, George IV., William IV., queen Victoria, Lord Melbourne, Sir Robert Peel, and the Duke of Wellington; and his statues of James Watt, Dr. Cyril Jackson, Grattan, Washington, Sir Joseph Banks, Spencer Percival, Canning, Sir John Malcolm, Dr. Dalton, Roscoe, General Gillespie, lady Louisa Russell (when a child), Bishops Bathurst and Ryder, &c. To this list we ought perhaps to add his principal statues in bronze, viz. George IV. at Brighton and in Edinburgh; Pitt in Hanover-square and Edinburgh; and the equestrian statues of Sir Thomas Munro, at Madras, and the duke of Wellington for the city of London. Sir Francis Chantrey died Nov. 25, 1841, leaving the bulk of his fortune to his widow, lady Chantrey for her life; with a few legacies, and a reversionary interest in his property to the royal academy, to be expended in improving and enlarging the present modes of studying the arts.

CHARLES X. ex-king of France, or CHARLES-PHILIPPE DE BOURBON, (known as Comte D'Artois until the accession of his brother Louis XVIII., and afterwards as Monsieur) was the fifth and youngest son of the Dauphin Louis, son of Louis XV., and was born in 1757. In early life he had acquired a character for dissipation, extravagance, and hauteur, which bore a still more unfavourable appearance when contrasted with the conduct of his elder brothers; and such, indeed, was his unpopularity, that at the very onset of the revolution he found it necessary for his personal safety to quit his native land. In 1773 he married the princess Maria Theresa, daughter of Victor Amadeus III. king of Sardinia; to whose court he now fled for refuge. He subsequently visited other parts of Europe, and eventually found an asylum, with his brother, Louis XVIII., first at Holyrood-house, Edinburgh, and afterwards at Hartwell, in Buckinghamshire. On his succeeding to the throne of France in 1824, it was seen that he adhered too much to the exploded dogmas of the old regime to acquire the same degree of popularity that, by good tact and a more complying disposition, his predecessor had enjoyed. On the 25th of July, 1830, in consequence of the result of a general election, Charles X. issued his two fatal ordinances, one abolishing the freedom of the press, and the other changing the mode of election. A popular insurrection, of three days' continuance, which has since been dignified with the title of "the glorious revolution of 1830," took place in Paris, and paved the way for Louis-Philippe. The king retreated from St. Cloud to Rambouillet, where he offered to abdicate in favour of his grandson, the duke of Bourdeaux, and requested from the provisional government a safe-conduct to a seaport. He embarked at Cherbourg, arrived off Spithead on the 17th of August, landed at Poole on the 23d, for a time took up his residence at Lulworth castle, and then removed to Holyrood-house, the scene of his former exile. There he remained about a twelvemonth; afterwards retired to the Austrian dominions; and died, in his 80th year, at Goritz, in Illyria, Nov. 4, 1837. The latter years of this monarch were passed in acts of superstitious devo-

CLANCARTY, RICHARD LE POER TRENCH, earl of, a statesman and diplomatist, was born in 1767, and succeeded to the peerage on the death of his father in 1803. He was the intimate friend of lord Castlereagh, and held various offices under government. In 1807 he was sworn in a privy-councillor, and elected one of the representative peers for Ireland; in 1812, appointed master of the mint; and in 1813, president of the board of trade. On the restoration of the prince of Orange to the sovereignty of the Netherlands, the earl accompanied him thither, and was appointed ambassador-extraordinary at his court; went as one of the plenipotentiaries from the king of Great Britain to the congress of Vienna, in 1814; was created a peer of the United Kingdom in 1815; was again appointed ambassador-extraordinary to the Netherlands in 1816; remained there two years; and subsequently enjoyed a pension of 3,000*l.* a-year for his diplomatic services. At the time the king of the Netherlands conferred the title of prince of Waterloo upon the duke of Wellington, he expressed the high sense he entertained of the earl of Clancarty's services, by conferring on him the title of marquis of Heusden. He died Nov. 31, 1837.

COLEBROOKE, HENRY THOMAS, F.R.S., an eminent Orientalist, and director of the Royal Asiatic Society, was the third son of Sir George Colebrooke, bart., a director of the East India Company. He was born in 1765; made great progress in his classical and mathematical studies under a private tutor; and in 1782 was appointed to a writership in India. In a few years he obtained a situation in the revenue department; and being sent as one of a deputation to investigate the resources of a part of the country, it led to his publishing "Remarks on the Husbandry and Commerce of Bengal;" in which treatise he advocated a free trade between Great Britain and her Eastern possessions. Soon after this he began the study of the Sanscrit language, in which he subsequently became so eminent. The translation of the great "Digest of Hindú Law," which had been compiled under the direction of Sir W. Jones, but left unfinished at his death, was confided to Mr. Colebrooke; and while engaged in this work, he was appointed to a judicial situation at Mirzapore, where he completed it in 1796. His other works consist of a "Dictionary of the Sanscrit Language, by Amersimha, with an English interpretation and annotations;" the "Algebra of the Hindoos;" and various treatises on their laws, philosophy, and arithmetic; besides numerous communications to the Society of which he was director. He died in March, 1837.

COLMAN, GEORGE, "the younger," an eminent dramatist and wit, son of George Colman, a sketch of whose life will be found in its proper alphabetical position), was born in 1762, and received his education at Westminster-school, Christchurch college, Oxford, and at King's college, Aberdeen; to which last he was sent, that he might be removed from the scenes of gaiety and dissipation with which the English university was rife. But neither the dread of ecclesiastic discipline, nor the hope of academic honours, could check the exuberance of his wit, or divert his youthful fancy from the erratic course in which it delighted to stray. His father was desirous of seeing him at the bar; and on his return from college, he was entered a student of Lincoln's Inn. Circumstances, however, as well as inclination, led him to abandon the profession of the law, and betake himself to that for which he was so well qualified. In 1784, his first acknowledged play, called "Two to One," was brought forward, and introduced to the public by a prologue from the pen of his father, who announced it as the production of "a chip of the old block." The success of this exceeded his most sanguine expectations, and naturally strengthened his bias in favour of dramatic composition. In 1787 his celebrated opera of "Lukie and Yarico" appeared, and at once stamped his fame. Shortly after this, the elder Colman was attacked with paralysis, which terminating in mental imbecility, his son presided over the destinies of the Haymarket theatre, and subsequently became its proprietor, catering for the public amusement most felicitously. The prolific pen of "George Colman, the younger" seemed never idle; and yet, perhaps, there was scarcely a man in London who spent more hours in convivial pleasures, or whose brilliant flashes of wit so often "set the table in a roar." Our limits render it necessary that we should now merely enumerate his principal works; and this we will do as nearly as we can in chronological order: "The Mountaineers;" "The Iron Chest;" "The Heir at Law;" "Blue Beard;" "The Review, or Wags of Windsor;" "The Poor Gentleman;" "Love laughs at Locksmiths;" "John Bull;" "Who wants a Guinea;" "We fly by Night;" "The Africans;" and "X.Y.Z." These, with numerous preludes and interludes, prologues and epilogues, may be said to embrace his dramatic works; his other compositions, entitled "Random Records;" "My Nightgown and Slippers;" "Broad Grins;" "Poetical Vagaries;" "Vagaries Vindicated, or Hypocritical Hypercritics;" complete the list. For many of his plays he received large sums of money, and others filled the treasury at the Haymarket; yet, owing to various causes, he had to contend with great pecuniary embarrassments for many years; from which he was at length relieved by the kindness of George IV., who appointed him to the situation of licensor and examiner of plays, an office for which he was admirably qualified. He died Oct. 26, 1836.

of foot guards in 1784: was promoted to a captaincy in 1792; appointed aid-de-camp to major-general Hulse in 1794, and served in Flanders with the duke of York. In 1798 he was raised to the lieutenant-colonelcy of his regiment; went with it to Holland in 1799; and was severely wounded at the battle near the village of Schorel, Sept. 19. In 1803 he was appointed to the office of assistant adjutant-general to the north-west district; quitted it and went to Sicily in 1806; received the brevet of colonel in 1808; and in 1809 was employed in the expedition to the Scheldt. From 1811 to July, 1813, he was engaged in the Peninsular war (having attained the rank of major-general); and in November following, he went with the brigade of guards to Holland; where, having reduced and taken possession of Helvoet and Williamstadt, he joined the forces of Sir Thomas Graham. He commanded the first division of the guards at the battle of Waterloo, and there lost his right arm. On the death of the brave Sir Thomas Picton he was made colonel of the 77th regiment; was transferred to the 40th in 1834; and died at his seat, Harefield Park, in February, 1837.

COOPER, SIR ASTLEY PASTON, bart, a surgeon of distinguished celebrity, was a son of the Rev. S. Cooper, rector of Yelverton and Morley, Norfolk, and was born at Brooke, in that county, in 1768. He was placed with a medical gentleman at Yarmouth, in 1782, but was soon removed to London in order to attend the hospitals, and was articled to his uncle, W. Cooper, esq. then surgeon to Guy's hospital. With him, however, he remained but a few months, being transferred to Mr. Cline, in which situation his extraordinary aptitude for his profession quickly developed itself. In his twentieth year he went to Edinburgh, but quickly returned to London and took up his abode with Mr. Cline, his former instructor, who found him so able a coadjutor, in his situation of demonstrator to the students, as to assign him a share in his anatomical lectures also. In this prominent position he outshone all who had preceded him, not as a mere orator, but as a popular teacher who aimed to make himself plain and intelligible to his hearers. His class of students increased from 50 to 100, which was the largest ever known in London. Mr. Pettigrew, who has so well described the effect of Sir Astley's lectures and his surprising skill as an operator, says "he was the idol of the Borough school; the pupils followed him in troops,—listening with almost breathless anxiety to catch the observations which fell from his lips upon the several cases presented to his view. But on the days of operation, this feeling was wound up to the highest pitch—the sight was altogether deeply interesting; the large theatre of Guy's crowded to the ceiling—the profound silence obtained upon his entry—that person so manly and truly imposing, and the awful feeling connected with the occasion, can never be forgotten by any of his pupils. The elegance of his operations, without the slightest affectation, all ease, all kindness to the patient, and equally solicitous that nothing should be hidden from the observation of

"As a lecturer Sir Astley was remarkable for his spirit and animation. However serious his humour might chance to be, from the pressure of professional avocations and the deep and awful responsibility with which he was affected on every side, the assumption of his place in the lecture theatre seemed to throw new life into him, to impart a vigour to his frame, and to give full scope to his professional enthusiasm." In 1792 he visited Paris, and attended the lectures of Desautel and Chopart; and on his return he took up his residence in the city, first in Jeffery-square and afterwards in Broad-street. His practice had now become immense; and long before he removed to New-street, Spring-gardens, he was decidedly affluent: while there he for many years realized from 18,000*l.* to 20,000*l.* per annum. Satisfied with the acquisition of a splendid fortune and a reputation for anatomical and surgical skill never surpassed, Sir Astley Cooper some years before his death retired for a time to the country, but he found that a life of quiescence and retirement would not suit his active mind, and he returned to London, once more to resume his professional avocations. Notwithstanding the immensity of his surgical operations, and the time he devoted to anatomical and physiological inquiries, he still found time to publish several works of great utility; but his imperishable fame rests mainly upon his accurate anatomical knowledge and the extraordinary facility with which he performed the most difficult operations in surgery. The honour of a baronetcy was conferred on him at the coronation of George IV. to whom he had been appointed surgeon. Died Feb. 13, 1841, aged 72.

COX, MRS. LETITIA. The name of this female, who died at Bybrook, in Jamaica, June 26, 1838, is inserted here as affording the most surprising instance of longevity to be met with in modern times. By her own account she was a grown-up young woman at the time of the destruction of Port Royal by an earthquake (June 9, 1692), so that she must have been upwards of 160 years of age. It is worthy of observation also, and especially interesting to those who advocate the "temperance" system, that she declared she never drank anything but water during her whole life.

DALHOUSIE, Right Hon. GEORGE RAMSAY, earl of, a British general, born in 1770, was the eldest son of George, the eighth earl of Dalhousie, and entered the army as a cornet in the dragoon guards in 1789. He was successively a captain in the Royals, major, and lieutenant-colonel in the 2d foot, and colonel of the 26th; received the rank of major-general in 1803; was promoted to that of lieutenant-general in 1813, and G.C.B.; was appointed captain-general and governor-in-chief of the forces in North America in 1819; and attained the full rank of general in 1830. He commenced his active military career at Martinique in 1792; served in Ireland during the rebellion of 1798; was present in all the actions of the campaign in Holland; distinguished himself under Sir Ralph Abercromby in Egypt; and commanded the 7th division in the Peninsula. This gallant officer died at Dalhousie Castle, near Edinburgh, March 21, 1835.

DANIELL, WILLIAM, R.A., an eminent draughtsman, was initiated in the pictorial art at a very early age, and accompanied his uncle to India, when he was only fourteen, for the express purpose of assisting in depicting the scenery, costume, &c. of that interesting country. During the ten years of their absence from England, they travelled many thousand miles, commencing their arduous journey at Cape Comorin, and closing it at Serinagur, in the Himalaya Mountains. Immediately on their return, the large work, entitled "Oriental Scenery," in six folio volumes, was commenced, and continued with the most persevering ardour, until its completion in 1808. He also published "A Picturesque Voyage to India;" a work entitled "Zoography;" and a great variety of separate views, &c. In 1814, he commenced the "Voyage round Great Britain," a most gigantic undertaking for an unassisted individual. Two or three months in each summer were devoted to collect drawings and notes, and the work was finished in 1825. During these solitary journeys he was subject to great fatigue, wretched fare, and still more wretched accommodation. In 1832, Mr. Daniell, and his friend Mr. Parria, executed the "Panorama of Madras;" and he subsequently painted two others, without assistance, namely, the "City of Lucknow," and the "Mode of Hunting Wild Elephants in Ceylon." He was particularly successful in depicting the ocean in all its varied aspects; and his glowing representations of Eastern scenery are well known to the public by his splendid "Oriental Annual." He died in August, 1837.

D'ARBLAY, Madame (formerly Miss Burney) was the daughter of Dr. Burney, the celebrated composer and author, and may be reckoned among the most distinguished novelists of the last century; her first work "Evelina," having created a greater sensation among the literati of her time, than was probably ever caused by any similar production. Her other chief works were "Cecilia, or the Memoirs of an Heiress;" "Camilla, or a Picture of Youth;" "The Wanderer, or Female Difficulties;" and "Memoirs of Dr. Burney." In 1793 she was married to M. D'Arblay, a French emigrant artillery officer; and having quitted England for a short residence at Paris during the peace of 1802, their detention by Napoleon was the consequence. Her husband afterwards resumed his rank in the army of his native country; and they continued to remain in France till the peace of 1814, when they came to England, and took up their residence at Bath. In that city M. D'Arblay (then a general) died, in 1818. There also died Madame D'Arblay, Jan. 6, 1840.

DAVIDSON, JOHN, a celebrated traveller, was the son of Mr. Davidson, an opulent tailor, in Cork-street. In 1814, he was apprenticed to Messrs. Savory and Moore, chemists, and became a partner in that firm at the expiration of his time; but his inclination for travel, induced him to quit the business in 1835; and from that period up to the time of his death, he had been almost constantly engaged in exploring distant regions. He visited North and South America, India, Egypt, Syria, Palestine, Greece, Italy, France, and Germany; enriching his mind with the most valuable information, and afterwards imparting it to the public in his lectures. His last expedition was to Africa, and it proved a fatal one. Whilst vainly attempting to reach the great object of European curiosity, the far-famed city of Timbuctoo, and when about twenty-five days' journey from it, (near the southern confines of the district of Egueda), he was robbed and murdered by a party of the tribe of El Harib, Dec. 18, 1836. The activity and perseverance of this intrepid traveller, combined with a rare union of physical advantages, and a gentle and conciliating disposition, would, it was confidently expected, have ensured his success. He had insured himself to great bodily privations, and was thoroughly conversant with the languages and customs of the East; but the treachery, cruelty, and dishonesty of the people through whose territories Mr. Davidson was passing, have at all times rendered it an undertaking of infinite hazard, if not of absolute hopelessness.

DIBDIN, THOMAS, a dramatic author and song-writer, was the eldest son of the celebrated Charles Dibdin, whose "naval songs" he was engaged in editing at the time of his death, and whose memoir will be found in the body of this work. He had the honour of having Garrick for his godfather, and in 1773, when only four years of age he appeared on the stage as Cupid, in Shakspeare's "Jubilee," to the Venus of Mrs. Siddons. At sixteen he was apprentice to Mr. (afterwards Sir William) Rawlins, to learn the trade of an upholsterer; but born and bred to "the profession," it was no wonder that after a few years he quitted the shop, and sought his fortune on the boards of various provincial theatres. From that time until 1795 he is said to have performed in every department of the drama, and written more than 1000 songs. He afterwards obtained an engagement at Covent Garden theatre; and numerous were the operas, farces, and entertainments which for that and other establishments, were produced by his fertile and inventive genius, during the term of half a century. From among them we may select "The Cabinet," "The English Fleet," "Mother Goose," (which yielded more than 20,000*l.* profit to the managers of Covent Garden theatre), "The High-mettled Racer," (a clear gain to the proprietors of Astley's of 13,000*l.*) "The Jew and Doctor," "Past Ten o'Clock," &c. &c. But, alas! prolific as was his brain, and successful as were his pieces, the latter days of his long and active life were uncheered by the result of his previous labours. Died, Sept. 1841.

DRUMMOND, THOMAS, under secretary of state for Ireland. Very early in life he was distinguished for his mathematical proficiency, and when he became private secretary to lord Althorp, who was then chancellor of the exchequer, his punctuality in attendance to his official duties, and the at once tried and unpretending plainness of the various official communications which his positions obliged him to make, as well to public bodies as to individuals, marked him, in the opinion of those who were best able to appreciate such qualities, and who, fortunately for the public service, had both the will and the power to reward and employ them, as the fittest possible person for the situation of under-secretary for Ireland—as difficult a post, from circumstances to which we need not allude, as any in the whole range of our civil service. But the cares of office did not prevent him from indulging his taste for study and experimental service; one of the fruits of which is the brilliant light which he invented, and which bears his name. The calculations upon which the schedules of the parliamentary reform bill were based, were made by him; and although they were subjected to the severe test of the minutest examination of the highly-gifted men who opposed that measure on general grounds, and were naturally inclined to look with great caution, not to say hostility, upon everything that had a tendency to justify it, the most rigid scrutiny only raised his character for accuracy. Died, 1840.

DUMARESQ, Lieut.-colonel HENRY, who at the time of his death was chief commissioner of the Australian company in New South Wales, entered the army as a lieutenant in the 9th foot, at the age of sixteen; and served in eight campaigns, of which six were in the Peninsula, one in Canada, and the last that of Waterloo. He was present in the thirteen battles for which medals were bestowed, and at several sieges; attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel after nine years service; was employed on the staff upwards of eighteen years; and was twice dangerously wounded. At the battle of Waterloo he was on the staff of General Sir John Byng, and was shot through the lungs at Hougoumont; but being at the time charged with a message for the duke of Wellington, he, as if supported by the resolution to do his duty, rode up to the duke, delivered his message, and then, as Sir Walter Scott describes it, dropped from his horse, to all appearance a dying man. The ball, which was never extracted, is supposed to have eventually induced paralysis, and caused his death, March, 1838.

DURHAM, Right Hon. JOHN GEORGE LAMETON, earl of, was the eldest son of W. H. Lameton, esq., of Lameton castle, M.P. for the city of Durham, by lady Anne Villiers, daughter of the earl of Jersey. He was educated at Eton, served in the 10th hussars, and at the age of twenty married Miss Harriet Cholmondeley, by whom he had three daughters, all now deceased. In 1815 this lady died; and in the following year he formed a matrimonial alliance with lady Louisa Elizabeth, the second daughter of earl Grey. During the whole of his parliamentary career he denounced Tory influence, and steadily adhered to the doctrine of reform as originally propounded by his noble father-in-law; but in 1827 we find him a supporter of Mr. Canning's ministry, and on the dissolution of lord Goderich's cabinet in 1828, he was raised to the peerage by the title of baron Durham. On the formation of earl Grey's government in 1830, he became a member of the cabinet, as lord privy seal; and to him is mainly attributed the great extent and liberality of the reform bill, and its eventual triumph. He was now hailed as the great leader of the movement party, and became a popular idol; his presence was eagerly solicited at all the great radical meetings, and his admirers were on tiptoe in the expectation that he would be raised to the head of public affairs. In 1835 his lordship went to Russia as ambassador, and remained there till the summer of 1837, when he returned to England; and in the following year he went out as governor-general to Canada, entrusted with extraordinary powers; but finding himself not supported as he expected by the ministry, he returned home the same year. So opposite have been the sentiments with regard to lord Durham's general policy and his qualifications as a statesman, that to a mind disposed to be impartial it is difficult to form a correct opinion of them; but we believe we may safely reiterate the following encomium on him;—"From his first appearance on the field of politics to the last, no man ever thought of even doubting his rectitude and determined adherence to his conscientious convictions." Born, April 12, 1792; died, July 28, 1840.

DYER, GEORGE, a classical scholar and miscellaneous writer, whose long life of literary toil may in some sort be exemplified by quoting from the "Gentleman's Magazine," the following mournful record:—"The greatest labour of his life was the share he had in the production of Valpy's edition of the Classics in 141 volumes; being a combination of the Delphin, Bipont, and Variorum editions. With the exception of the preface, Dyer contributed all that was original in this vast work, upon which he was engaged from the year 1819 to 1830! He had scarcely completed this work when his eye-sight gave way, and shortly afterwards left him in total blindness." The essions; and there are few who will dispute the character given of him by that able and upright advocate, Sir Samuel Romilly, who in the House of Commons declared, "there never was a man in the court of chancery who more endeared himself to the bar, or exhibited more humane attention to the suitors: there never presided in that court a man of more deep and various learning in his profession; and in anxiety to do justice, that court had never seen, he would not say the superior, but the equal, of the lord chancellor. If he had a fault, it was an over-anxiety to do justice." Of his politics we have no intimation to speak: they will yet be viewed through the various lights and shades of party feeling; it may, however, be just necessary to observe, that on the two great questions, Catholic Emancipation and Parliamentary Reform, he was ever the inflexible opponent; but no one, with due reflection, will attribute to lord Eldon a want of integrity, or a departure from any principle which he conscientiously believed would tend to the good of his country. His lordship's personal property was sworn under 700,000*l.*, the greater part of which, together with the estates, he bequeathed to his grandson, the present earl.

ELGIN, the Right Hon. THOMAS BRUCE, earl of ELGIN and KINCARDINE, was born in 1771, succeeded to the peerage in his childhood, and received his education at Harrow and Westminster schools, and at the university of St. Andrew's. His lordship entered the foot guards in 1783, and attained to the rank of general in 1837. On many occasions the earl of Elgin was honoured with diplomatic missions, the last of which was as ambassador extraordinary to the Sublime Porte, in 1789, where he continued till the French were finally driven out of Egypt. Being desirous of rescuing the remains of Greece also from destruction and oblivion, he availed himself of the opportunities of his station, and succeeded in forming a vast collection of statues, specimens of architecture, medals, and other valuable antiquities, which were eventually purchased by government for 35,000*l.* and deposited in the British Museum. Much censure has been lavished by lord Byron and others on the earl of Elgin for removing these antiquities from Athens; but if it be true, as is asserted, that the cost, including interest of money, amounted to 74,000*l.* the "mercantile spirit" with which he has been charged is altogether without foundation, inasmuch as he lost more than one half of that sum in endeavouring to secure these invaluable treasures. Died, at Paris Nov. 1841, aged 73.

ELLEY, Lieutenant-general Sir JOHN, a distinguished English officer, whose services are the more worthy of record, because, by his own sheer merit, he rose to almost the highest military rank, and to a host of other honours, to which we shall presently have to allude, from the very humble situation of a private in the royal horse guards blue. The exact date of his enlistment we do not know; but, after passing through the inferior grades, and serving with great credit as a quartermaster, he, in 1791, obtained a cornetcy in the blues. He served in the campaigns of the Low Countries in 1793, and two following years, and was present at nearly every action, including the siege of Valenciennes. By the year 1806, he had fought his way up to a lieutenant-colonelcy; in 1806 and 1809 he served as assistant adjutant-general to the cavalry in Spain; and was present at all the sanguinary affairs in that country and Portugal throughout the remainder of the Peninsular war. He subsequently served in the Netherlands, and was at the final shock of battle, "Waterloo," where he was serviceable not merely as an officer, but even as an individual trooper; for we read in Sir Walter Scott's "Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk," that several of Napoleon's cuirassiers were found cleft to the very chine by Elley's stalwart arm. In addition to his high military rank, and the profitable as well as honourable colonelcy of the 17th lancers, Sir John was K.C.B.; K.C.H.; K.M.T.; K.S.G.; and governor of Galway. Died, 1839.

FAGEL, HENRY, baron, a Dutch statesman, and formerly ambassador from Holland to Great Britain. He was strongly attached to the house of Orange, and consequently partook of the misfortunes which befel that family during the triumph of French principles in his native country; but he returned to it with the stadtholder, and was much engaged in the diplomatic acts of his government. Died, 1838.

FANE, General Sir HENRY, commander-in-chief in India, and colonel of the 1st dragoon guards, was born in 1778, and entered the army as a cornet in the dragoon guards when in his 15th year. In this regiment he received regular promotion, till, in 1805, he was removed to the lieutenant-colonelcy of the 1st or king's dragoon guards. In 1808 he was appointed brigadier-general, accompanied Sir Arthur Wellesley to Portugal, and was afterwards attached to the army of Sir John Moore, commanding a brigade, and assisting in all the operations of that disastrous campaign. He subsequently had the command of a brigade of cavalry, and was present at Talavera and many other battles during 1810 and 1811; but, suffering greatly from ill health, he was obliged to resign his command, and return to England. His health being restored, in 1813 he again resumed his duties in the Peninsula, and commanded the cavalry and horse artillery at the battles of Orthes and Toulouse. On his arrival at home, he was promoted to the colonelcy of the 23rd light dragoons, from which he was soon removed to the 4th dragoon guards, and appointed inspector of cavalry. He was next placed in command of the cavalry and horse artillery of the British army of occupation in France; and in 1819 received the brevet of lieutenant-general. In 1827 he was appointed to the colonelcy of the 1st dragoon guards, and in 1831 received the full rank of general.

bers for Rye. He subsequently represented Midhurst, Wendover, and Haslemere; was appointed secretary of state for Ireland in 1806; became postmaster-general, from which office he retired in 1836, and was created baron Farborough. His lordship possessed considerable taste for literature and the fine arts; was on terms of intimacy and held office with Mr. Pitt; and he had the honour of enjoying the private friendship of George IV., who consulted him on all subjects connected with the improvement of the royal palaces, the purchase of paintings, &c. Died, Jan. 17, 1838.

FAWCETT, JOHN, an eminent theatrical performer, was the son of an actor of humble pretensions at Drury-lane, and was born in London, in 1769. At the age of fifteen, he was apprenticed to a linen-draper, but being born, as it were, to the stage, he disdained all other occupations, and clandestinely left the shop for the Margate theatre, where under the name of Foote he made his first appearance. He afterwards joined Tate Wilkinson on the York circuit; and in 1791 made his bow to a London audience, at Covent-garden, as Caleb, in "He would be a Soldier." It was not till some years after this, that his acting attracted much notice, though his celebrated song of "What's a Woman like!" and the mock Italian bravura, "Maestro was an Opera Singer," were highly applauded. His dramatic reputation was, however, at once fixed by his representation of Doctor Pangloss, Olapod, Caleb Quotem, and Job Thornberry. In 1798 he joined the Haymarket company, and became acting-manager, in 1800, of that theatre. In 1813 he appeared at the English Opera, and in 1816 rejoined the Haymarket. He afterwards became manager of Covent-garden theatre, which situation he held till his retreat from the stage, in 1836. Owing to some domestic misfortunes, Mr. Fawcett, for the few last years of his life was a pensioner on the Covent-garden Theatrical Fund, of which he had for a long period been treasurer. In private life his conduct was irreproachable, but there was a bluntness in his manners, which, to a stranger, often appeared like intentional rudeness. He died at Botley, Hants, in March, 1837.

FERGUSON, the Right Hon. ROBERT CUTLAR, an eminent lawyer and statesman. He was in early life considered to be somewhat dangerously violent in his politics; and, being in court during the trial of Arthur O'Connor for high treason, he joined others in endeavouring to rescue the prisoner. For this attempt he was imprisoned for one year, at the expiration of which he complied with the intreaties of his friends (who deemed him in actual danger in England, on account of his politics), and sailed for India. There he devoted himself wholly to his profession, and became so distinguished in it, that he acted as attorney-general while the office was vacant by the retirement of that officer, and the non-arrival of his successor. Having returned home with a large fortune, he in 1826 contested the election of the stewardry of Kirkcudbright, and was returned member, though only by a majority of one. He was a tolerable parliamentary orator, and being a constant supporter of Whig principles, he was raised by Lord Melbourne's government to the office of judge advocate, and sworn of the privy council in 1834. He resigned during the short subsequent administration of Sir R. Peel; but was restored to office on the return to power of Lord Melbourne. Born, 1770; died, 1839.

FESCH, His Eminence JOSEPH, senior priest-cardinal of the sacred college, and archbishop of Lyons. By the maternal side he was brother of Letitia Ramolini, mother of Napoleon Buonaparte. He was born at Ajaccio, in Corsica, about six years before the island fell under the subjection of the French. At the age of thirteen he was sent to complete his education in France, and was still in that country when the Revolution broke out. Young and ardent, he instantly became attached to the new state of things, threw off the clerical attire of the seminary at which he was studying, and entered the army of Montesquieu, in Switzerland, in the capacity of a store-keeper; and in 1796 we find him holding the important and lucrative appointment of commissary-general to the army of Italy, which was then commanded by his nephew, Buonaparte—an appointment in which he saved, what may without exaggeration be called, a princely fortune. Having done so, and rightly judging that the interest of his nephew would sooner or later stand him in good stead at Rome, he retired from the army, resumed his clerical studies and profession, and in 1802 was, by the cardinal legate in person, consecrated archbishop of Lyons. Early in the following year he received a cardinal's hat, and went to Rome as ambassador from France. He was received at Rome with peculiar distinction; but it would seem that the cardinal's hat, any more than the monk's hood, does not always cover true piety. His luxurious way of living, and a certain air of the camp that appeared both in his mien and in his conversation, gave considerable scandal to the graver Romans—and that scandal was especially increased by his obstinately persisting in giving concerts at his palace, even in Lent, in defiance of a particular and very strict order to the contrary. As if to show his utter contempt alike of the order and of the feeling that dictated it, he actually sent a circular of invitation to his concerts to the whole of the cardinals!—not one of whom, to their credit be it said, would attend. In 1804 the cardinal accompanied Pius VII. to Paris, and assisted in the consecration of Napoleon; by whom, in the following year, he was made grand almoner of France, a principal officer of the Legion of Honour, and a member of the senate. In 1806 the elector arch-chancellor of the German empire nominated him his coadjutor and successor, and the king of Spain decorated him with the order of the Golden Fleece. As president of the council of Paris, he opposed his self-willed nephew in many of his unjust schemes, and both boldly and constantly, though ineffectually, protested against the violence with which he insulted and ill-treated the unfortunate pope. It says very much for the goodness of his heart that he braved the implacable temper, which he well knew his nephew to possess, rather than sanction, even by his silence, the ill-treatment of a fallen old man, from whom in the then state of the world, nothing could reasonably be hoped. Napoleon, who was as incapable of sympathizing with such true greatness of mind as he was of practising it, showed how deeply he felt his uncle's opposition by depriving him of his succession to the arch-chancellorship, and nominating in his stead Eugene Beauharnois, with the title of Grand Duke of Frankfurt. When his disgrace with the emperor was thus published, he retired at first to Lyons, and subsequently to Rome, where, with Madame Buonaparte, he lived a quiet but most luxurious life. His library and picture gallery were the finest that even Rome, that city of the arts, could boast. Born, 1764; died, 1830.

FITZHERBERT, MARIA ANNE, a lady who at one period of her life occupied too prominent a place in the history of the country, for her name to be passed by silently at her decease, was the sister of the late Walter Smythe, esq. of Bambridge, near Winchester, and was married in 1776 to Edward Weld, esq. of Lutworth castle, uncle to the late cardinal Weld. Her husband died, without issue, within a twelve-month from the day of marriage, and she was soon after united to Thomas Fitzherbert, esq., who also died, leaving no offspring, in 1781. Having found it necessary to allude to Mrs. Fitzherbert, at some length, in our memoir of George IV., we shall avoid repeating the facts there stated, merely observing that, attracted by the beauty and fascination of the blooming widow, the prince urgently pressed his suit, and a marriage, according to the forms of the Catholic church, is believed (but never was thoroughly ascertained) to have taken place about 1787. She naturally became the object of great public and political interest; but the influence she possessed was always exerted for the honour of him to whom she was united; and she found, after her retirement from the meretricious splendour that had once surrounded her, ample means for the employment of her mind, in acts of most generous benevolence. Died, March, 1837.

FITZJAMES, EDWARD, duke of, was the great grandson of the duke of Berwick, who was natural son of James II. of England, by a sister of the duke of Marlborough. At the time of the French Revolution, the name of the duke of Fitzjames was placed on the list of proscription, in consequence of his having emigrated; but, at the restoration of the Bourbon family, he returned to France, and became aide-de-camp and first nobleman of the chamber to the comte d'Artois, afterwards Charles X. In the chamber of peers he was remarkable for the constancy yet moderation with which he upheld the monarch. After the revolution of 1830, he was no less a favoured person than before it, having readily sworn allegiance to the new state of things. He is chiefly noticeable as being in some sort a member of our ill-fated Stuart family. Died, 1839.

FONBLANQUE, JOHN DE GRENIER, an eminent barrister, was descended from a noble family in the south of France, some of whom, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, came to England, and founded the celebrated house of agency, into which they subsequently admitted as a partner, Mr. Theilsson, originally their book-keeper, but who afterwards realized that prodigious fortune which has since so often occupied public attention, through its singular testamentary disposition. John Fonblanque, the subject of this article, was born in 1759; received his education at Harrow and Oxford; and in 1763 was called to the bar. In 1790, he acted as leading counsel for the London merchants, in opposition to the Quebec bill, at the bar of the House of Commons. In 1793 appeared his celebrated "Treatise on Equity," which went through several editions, and is regarded by the courts as an authority on the subject. In 1802 he was elected M.P. for Camelford, and continued a member until the dissolution in 1806. In 1804 he obtained a silk gown with a patent of precedence, and for many years enjoyed an extensive equity practice. He was an able advocate of the Whig party, and a personal friend of the prince of Wales, for whom he now is supposed to have written the celebrated letters to the king, on the subject of his royal highness' exclusion from the army, which were generally attributed to lord Mordaunt. He died, Jan. 4, 1837. His sons are men of eminence in their respective vocations; John Samuel Martin Fonblanque, esq., is commissioner of bankrupts; and Albany Fonblanque, esq., a writer of no ordinary calibre, is editor of "The Examiner."

FOSBROOKE, Rev. THOMAS DUDLEY, F.S.A., a learned and industrious antiquary and archaeologist, was born in 1770, and received his education at St. Paul's school, London, and Pembroke college, Oxford. Mr. Fosbrooke commenced his literary career in 1796, with a poem entitled "The Economy of Monastic Life;" and in 1799 he produced his "British Monachism," 2 vols. 8vo., having previously applied himself with extraordinary diligence to the study of the Saxon language. His next great work was the "History of Gloucestershire," in 2 vols. 4to." and in 1819 appeared his "History of the City of Gloucester." These were followed by "The Wye Tour," "Ariconsensia," and the "Berkeley Manuscripts." In 1824 he published his most important work, the "Encyclopædia of Antiquities, and Elements of Archaeology," 2 vols. 4to.; and in 1828, a kind of sequel to it, called "Foreign Topography." "The Tourist's Grammar," and several other works also appeared from his pen; and he was for many years a prolific contributor to the "Gentleman's Magazine." Mr. Fosbrooke's church preferment was as scanty as his literary industry was great. For sixteen years he officiated as curate of Horsley, in Gloucestershire; during the next twenty years he was curate of Walford, (on the banks of the Wye); and for the last twelve years of his life he was its vicar. This worthy man and learned antiquary died on New-year's day, 1842.

than of biography to describe the events, important though they be, which distinguish the reign of a monarch: we shall therefore observe, generally, that during all the extraordinary vicissitudes to which he and his country were subjected by the successes of Napoleon, his conduct and firm unbending character ensured for him the confidence of his army and the regard of all his subjects who were not imbued with the widely spreading doctrines of republicanism. To the king of Prussia is principally attributed the duration of so long a peace: he it was who admitted Louis Philippe amongst the legitimate sovereigns of the continent, and allowed of the marriage of the latter's eldest son, which has consolidated his throne and perpetuated his race. He died at Berlin, June 7, 1840.

GALT, JOHN, a voluminous author on a great variety of subjects, but chiefly known as a novelist. His novels are in general laid in Scotland, and his quaint phraseology and intimate acquaintance with every light and shadow of Scottish life, make them really important to all who would know Scotland—especially the Scotland of middle and lower life—as it really is. The list of his works is formidably long: perhaps the best of them are, "The Entail;" "The Annals of the Parish;" "The Ayrshire Legatees;" and "Ringan Gilhaize." Independent of his numerous novels, he published tragedies, minor poems, voyages and travels, and several biographies. He was for some time editor of the "Courier" newspaper, with a salary of 800*l.* a-year, and it is asserted that he gave up that appointment rather than allow the insertion, though at the request of a minister, of an article which he considered objectionable. For several years previous to his death he suffered very severely from paralysis of the limbs. Born, 1780; died, 1839.

GARROW, the Right Hon. Sir WILLIAM, was the second son of the Rev. D. Garrow, of Monkton Hadley, Middlesex, where he was born in 1760. Having been placed under Mr. Southouse, a special pleader, he was called to the bar in 1783, and soon distinguished himself by his acuteness and knowledge of the law. In 1793 he became king's counsel; attorney-general to the prince of Wales in 1805; solicitor-general to the crown in 1812; attorney-general in 1814; chief justice of Chester in the same year; and a baron of the court of exchequer in 1817. He held that office till 1832; and in compliment to his long and valuable judicial services, was sworn a member of the privy council. From this time he lived in retirement at his marine villa, Pegwell Cottage, near Ramsgate. Died, aged 80, Sept. 1840.

GENEST, Rev. JOHN, was educated at Westminster, whence he removed, as a pensioner, to Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became a scholar at the commencement of the second year of his residence. After officiating for very many years as curate of a retired village in Lancashire, he was appointed private chaplain to the duke of Ancaster. Though he is believed to have been a rather voluminous writer, he has left but one published work, "The His-

GILBERT, DAVIES, an eminent man of science, vice-president of the Royal Society, and member of numerous other learned and scientific societies. His family name was Giddy, and he was born at St. Erth, in Cornwall. In 1708 he married the daughter of a wealthy Sussex gentleman named Gilbert, whose name and arms he assumed pursuant to royal sign manual in 1817. Blessed with large wealth, Mr. Davies Gilbert did not content himself with aiding the advance of science by his own most indefatigable exertions, but took every opportunity of bringing forth talent from obscurity, and of affording its possessor those advantages which his own poverty might otherwise have denied him, to the utter destruction of his hopes and prevention of his usefulness. He it was, to whom the great Sir Humphrey Davy mainly owed it, that his great talents were not lost to himself and society in the obscurity of a Cornish apothecary's shop; and several less distinguished, but able and useful, men were equally indebted to him. He contributed several papers to the transactions of scientific societies, and published "A Plain Statement of the Bullion Question," but he seems to have been far less ambitious of bringing his own abilities before the public, than of indirectly exerting them for the public good. His whole character is so well stated by his biographer, that we borrow the very words of his summing up:—"The Roman simplicity which marked his demeanour was, in itself, a perpetual letter of recommendation to the intelligent observer of mankind, and the sense of that was heightened by farther intercourse, which developed his English and gentlemanlike courtesy, his kind and affable attention, and his various and profound attainments. It was, indeed, delightful to contemplate such qualities reposing so quietly within the calm mind of their possessor; like the treasure-mines of his native country, without a sign upon the surface to tell where their exhaustless wealth existed. And he must have been able to dig deep who could have explored the stores of knowledge in all the exact sciences which was there to be found; for Mr. Gilbert was acknowledged to be at the very head of those whose application to the more abstruse branches of learning have been crowned with the greatest success. He communicated largely to the wants of others from his own great stores of knowledge, and shone more by those reflected lights than by the direct diffusion of his rays. He represented the borough of Bodmin in parliament, from 1806 to 1832. Born, 1767; died, 1840.

GLYN, Sir RICHARD CARR, bart., an eminent London banker, and an alderman from the year 1790, till he resigned his gown in 1833. He was born in 1755; served the office of sheriff in 1790; was lord-mayor in 1799; became father of the corporation on the death of Sir W. Curtis in 1829; and died in April, 1838, aged 83.

ber of the British parliament, where his efforts in favour of the abolition of slavery, and the opposition generally manifested by him to the proceedings of the Bank of England, rendered him a prominent character. He was also governor of the Royal Exchange Assurance Company. Born, 1762; died, 1838.

GREGORY, OLINTHUS, LL.D. was born at Yaxley, in Huntingdonshire, in 1774. He commenced his literary career at the age of nineteen, by publishing "Lessons, Astronomical and Philosophical, for the Amusement and Instruction of British Youth;" but the works which chiefly brought him into notice were his "Treatise on Astronomy," and the "Pantologia," a comprehensive dictionary of the arts and sciences, of which he undertook the general editorship. Through the interest of his friend Dr. Hutton, he was appointed, in 1802, mathematical master at the royal military academy, Woolwich; in which establishment he eventually obtained the Professor's chair, filling it with reputation until he was obliged through ill-health, brought on by intense study, to resign it in 1838. Besides the works above mentioned, and many others, Dr. Gregory was the author of "Elements of Plane and Spherical Trigonometry," "Mathematics for Practical Men," Letters to a Friend, on the Evidences, Doctrines, and Duties of the Christian Religion," 2 vols, and "Memoirs of the Life, Writings, &c. of the late John Mason Good, M.P." His original papers and editorial labours, also, on different branches of art and science were numerous; and from the year 1817 he had the whole of the general superintendence of the almanacks published by the stationers' company. Died, 1841.

GUSTAVUS IV. ex-king of Sweden, was born in 1778, and ascended the throne when his father fell by the hand of an assassin, March 29, 1792. During his minority the administration of affairs was committed to the duke of Sudermania, as regent; and on becoming of age, the young king went to Russia, to receive the hand of Catharine Paulowna, daughter of the empress, but on its being required that his bride should be allowed to profess the religion of the Greek church, he abruptly put an end to the negotiations, and returned to Sweden. He soon after wedded a princess of Baden, and was at that place when the duke of Enghien was there so unjustifiably seized, and after a mock trial, shot, by the orders of Napoleon. From that moment Gustavus resolved upon an eternal hostility to the French emperor. He ordered his ambassador to leave Paris, and dismissed the French ambassador from Sweden, while at the same time he returned to the king of Prussia the order of the black eagle, with which Napoleon had been invested, saying "that he never could, according to the laws of knighthood, consent to be brother companion of the assassin of the duke of Enghien." After this he continued to join every party opposed to, and to wage war with every party in alliance with, the emperor. His hostile proceedings, however, became at last so pregnant with danger to his country, that the council of state entreated him to make peace. This he refused to do, and a revolution in Sweden was the consequence. He and his family were, in 1809, conveyed to the fortress of Drottningholm, and afterwards to Gripsholm, where he signed his abdication; his uncle, the duke of Sudermania, was then raised to the throne, by the title of Charles XIII., and Christian Augustus, of Holstein Augustenburg, was invested with the title of prince royal of Sweden, or heir apparent. This prince dying soon after, the succession was transferred to marshal Bernadotte, who in 1818 ascended the Swedish throne, as Charles John XIV. After his abdication and imprisonment, Gustavus was for years known as a mere wanderer upon the face of Europe, sometimes bearing the designation of count Gottorp, sometimes that of the duke of Holstein, and again the more humble one of Gustavson. He was in England, at Hartwell, with Louis XVIII. His latter years were spent in poverty; his small annuity being less than 100*l*. From his relations and friends he would receive nothing; and his son, prince Gustavus Vasa, a general in the Austrian service, naturally anxious to render his father's condition less miserable, was compelled to adopt various devices to assist him. This unfortunate monarch died in February, 1837.

HALKETT, Sir PETER, bart., was second son of the fourth baronet of that name. He entered the naval service of his country at an early age, and at the beginning of the French war in 1793, served as lieutenant on board the Syren frigate, in which H.R.H. the duke of York took his passage to Holland for the purpose of assuming the command of the British troops sent there to co-operate with the Dutch forces in repelling the French. The garrison of Williamstadt was at that time very closely besieged by the French, and lieutenant Halkett displayed so much zeal, daring, and ability, that H.R.H. the duke of York honoured him with his especial notice and commendation, recommended him almost immediately for promotion to the rank of commander, and not very long afterwards to that of post captain. He was also honoured with a medal of the value of 500 guilders, bearing a highly complimentary inscription, which was presented to him by the prince of Orange. Soon after captain Halkett was posted, which was in August, 1794, he obtained the command of the Circe, of 28 guns, stationed in the North Sea. Of his qualities as an officer, some notion may be formed from the fact, that in the alarming mutinies which marked the year 1797, the Circe's crew took no part, a fact which obtained captain Halkett the public thanks of the lords of the admiralty and the freedom of the city of Hull. Captain Halkett passed from the Circe to the Apollo, with which he convoyed the outward-bound West India fleet, and afterwards cruised on the Jamaica station for nearly three years, making many valuable prizes. He was subsequently appointed to the Ganges, 74; in 1812 he obtained the rank of rear-admiral; in 1821 that of vice-admiral, and in 1837, that of admiral. In the last-named year, too, being then in command of the North American station, he succeeded to the baronetcy on the death of his brother. Born, 1766; died, 1840.

HALLIDAY, Sir ANDREW, an eminent physician, K.H., M.D., and F.R.S. of Edinburgh and Göttingen. He was originally educated for the church, but, being of an ardent and active disposition, he prevailed on his friends to allow him to embrace a more active pursuit. After going through the usual routine of education, in addition to a diligent attention to those studies more especially connected with the profession of medicine, Mr. Halliday travelled throughout Russia, Hungary, and Poland; and on his return to England commenced practice at Birmingham, where he met with very considerable success. His active nature, however, soon induced him to obtain a medical appointment on the staff of the army, and he served with great credit to himself, and no less advantage to the troops in Spain and Portugal. He was present at the memorable assault upon Bergen-op-Zoom, and at the still more memorable battle of Waterloo. His great professional talents, his stock of general knowledge, and his amiable and prepossessing manners, gained him an enviable distinction, both abroad and at home, to which circumstance he doubtless partly owed the honour of being selected to fill the post of travelling medical attendant to William IV., when that sovereign, then duke of Clarence, was obliged to travel for the restoration of his health. On the paternal side he could boast of being descended from the sister of the great Sir William Wallace, and he inherited all the love of country which distinguished the Scottish warrior. Much as he mixed in the more active scenes of life, he found time to produce several publications, all of them above mediocrity, and some of high merit. The principal of his works are a "Memoir on the West Indies;" "Observations on Ephymeria, or the disease which arises from the diffusion of air into the cavity of the throat;" "Remarks on the Lunatic Asylums in Ireland;" "Observations on the State of the Portuguese army, 1811;" a translation of Professor Frank's "Exposition of the Causes of Diseases;" "Memoir of the Campaign of 1815;" a "History of the House of Brunswick and Lunenburg;" and "Annals of the House of Hanover;" and, in addition to these he was, at the time of his death, busied in preparing for the press a History of the principal campaigns of the duke of Wellington, for which he had collected an abundance of materials. Died, 1840.

HARDY, Vice-admiral Sir THOMAS, G.C.B., a gallant officer, of whom, for his own fame's sake, it might suffice to say that he was the friend and brother-in-arms of the gallant Nelson, whose last breath he received on board the Victory; but the life of such a man is too important as an example to be so lightly passed over. At the early age of twelve he entered the royal navy as a midshipman on board the Helena, of fourteen guns, and in November, 1793, was made lieutenant in the Meleager, of the squadron of Nelson, under whose notice he was thus brought. He was thenceforth constantly employed under that hero, who, in 1797, promoted him to the command of the brig La Mutine, of the capture of which he was the main cause. His constant gallantry, and especially his conduct at the battle of the Nile, in which his vessel, La Mutine, was the only single decker that was present, caused Nelson to promote him to the command of the Vanguard. In July, 1803, he became flag-captain to Nelson, on board the Victory, and he it was who, on the fatal though glorious 21st of October, 1805, received the last orders of the greatest naval chief the world has ever seen. For his services at Trafalgar he was created a baronet. After six and thirty years of arduous and efficient service in every quarter of the globe, he was, in 1834, appointed to the lucrative and honourable post of governor of Greenwich Hospital, where he constantly resided till the close of his valuable life. Born, 1769; died, 1839.

HARRISON, WILLIAM HENRY, president of the United States of America, was born in Virginia, in 1773; his father being one of the most conspicuous among the patriots of the revolution. After receiving the customary education at Hampden Sydney college, he studied for the medical profession; but participating in the general excitement which prevailed throughout the country against the barbarous mode of warfare at that time practised by the Indians on the north-western frontiers, he suddenly abandoned the precepts of Galen, and joined his brethren in arms, as an ensign in the U. S. artillery. This was in 1791, when he was but eighteen, and he continued in the army till 1797, when his career of civil services began. His first appointment was that of secretary and ex-officio lieutenant-governor of the north-western territory; he was subsequently appointed governor of Indiana Territory; while both as an officer of the government, and as an able representative in congress, he displayed the principles of a disinterested patriot. During the years 1811, 1812, and 1813, general Harrison assembled a body of militia and volunteers, and marched against the Indians, who, under Tecumseh, had created serious disturbances on the frontier; and the result proved how eminently fitted he was for conducting the operations of war against a savage foe. The most signal success crowned his efforts; and he was appointed by Mr. Madison to negotiate with those enemies against whom his military skill had been so ably directed. In 1828 he was sent as United States minister to Columbia; and in 1840 he received the highest honour that can be bestowed upon a citizen of a free country, in being elected to preside over it as its chief magistrate. But just as his measures were coming into operation, and when at the height of his popularity, he was seized with an illness, and died April 4, 1841; being the first American president whose death has occurred while in office.

HIBBERT, GEORGE, an eminent merchant and citizen of London, alike distinguished for his talents and public spirit, was born in Manchester, in 1737. Being destined from his youth to a commercial life, he was introduced into a leading mercantile house in the city, engaged in the West India trade; in which, first as a junior partner, and eventually as head of the firm, he continued nearly half a century. Possessing strong common sense, a retentive memory, and a mind richly stored with various information, together with the faculty of expressing himself in a public assembly with clearness and fluency, he became a valuable adviser and condutor on all commercial questions; he was accordingly selected to move the resolutions of the merchants, bankers, and traders, which led to the imposition of the property-tax in 1798, when the exigencies of the nation required the sacrifice; and again to move those resolutions which forced its repeal in 1806. In 1806 he was elected M.P. for Seaford, and sat for that borough till 1812. He was greatly instrumental in originating and maturing that noble undertaking, the West India Docks; "in grateful testimony" of which, in 1804, he was presented by the company with some splendid ornamental plate. Mr. Hibbert was elected F.R.S. in 1810; he was also F.S.A., and a member of the Roxburgh club. Botany likewise engaged his attention, and served as an employment for him in his retirement from the active duties of commercial life. He employed agents in almost every part of the globe to send him whatever was rare and curious; and he was the means of introducing into this country many new and beautiful species of plants. The collection thus formed, at his residence at Clapham, was commenced forty years before his death; and to the empress Josephine it was frequently indebted. Having, in 1829, succeeded to the estate of the late Rogers Parker, esq., of Munden, in Hertfordshire, (his wife's uncle) he quitted mercantile pursuits; and in his retirement enjoyed the intimate friendship of many distinguished public characters. He died, Oct. 8, 1837.

HICKS, JOHN, a gallant British officer, late colonel of the 32nd foot, which regiment he entered as an ensign in 1766. In the early part of his career he served at Gibraltar and the West Indies; and when in 1811 he received the brevet of lieutenant-colonel, he sailed with the regiment for the Peninsula. He was present at Cuidad Rodrigo, Salamanca, Burgos, Pampeluna, and at the battles of the Pyrenees, Nivelle, Nive, and Orthes. He also commanded his regiment at the battles of Quatre Bras and Waterloo, in both of which it was actively engaged from the commencement to the end, and on those days his horse was five times wounded under him; several balls also passed through his coat, and one grazed his forehead. On the advance of the army to Paris he was appointed by the duke of Wellington one of the commandants of the city; and he received various crosses and other honourable tokens for his services. Died, at Malvern, April, 1838.

HILL, Sir GEORGE FITZGERALD, bart., was educated for the legal profession, but the turbulent politics of the times during the French Revolution, and the effect of those politics upon the public mind in Ireland, led him to devote himself to the task of upholding the constitution. He was returned as member of parliament for Coleraine in 1791, and sat for that borough until the death of his father, Sir Hugh Hill, in 1795; when he was unanimously elected as member for the city of Londonderry, which his father had represented for upwards of a quarter of a century. Before the meeting of parliament, however, he accepted the valuable and important office of clerk of the Irish House of Commons—which acceptance of course vacated his seat. In 1802 he was again chosen to represent Londonderry, and he continued to do so until the year 1830, when he was appointed Governor of the Island of St. Vincent; from which, in 1833, he was removed to fill the same important post in the Island of Trinidad. During the stormy and perilous times of the Irish rebellion, Sir George held the important offices of colonel of the Londonderry militia, recorder of Derry, and captain-commandant of the Londonderry yeomanry. Holding such offices in a country so torn and agitated as Ireland then was, it is difficult to say whether firmness towards the bold and bad, or consideration towards the merely deluded and ignorant, and their innocent but no less suffering connections, were the most required. Fortunately for those who moved within the very extended sphere of his influence, Sir George Hill united firmness, where it was needed, to mercy, where it was practicable, to an extent that enabled him to command the admiration of his political opponents, even while most signalizing himself in upholding the institutions of his country, and vindicating the rights and honor of his sovereign. Aided by his brother, Mr. Rowley Hill, he formed a battalion, cavalry and infantry, 500 strong, which was of the most important service in putting a stop to the insane proceedings of the misguided men who were urged into rebellion by the incendiary speeches and writings of the demagogues of the day. Born, 1763; died, 1839.

HILTON, WILLIAM, R.A., an eminent English artist. His forte was the picturesque ideal, and it is difficult to say whether he was most excellent as a designer, or as a colourist. His pictures are very numerous, and if they have not been made what is called "popular," by means of engravings from them, it is because their chastity of design and their exquisite finish make them essentially and exclusively appeal only to the genuine cognoscenti. His "Rape of Ganymede," "Hebe," and "Rape of Proserpine," are exquisite, especially the first-named, which was his presentation piece when he was elected R.A., in 1820. On the death of the great, though eccentric Fuseli, Mr. Hilton succeeded him as keeper of the Royal Academy, and in that important office he so ably and indefatigably directed and aided the students, that just before his death they presented him with a valuable piece of plate. Born, 1767; died, 1840.

HOARE, Sir RICHARD COLT, bart., F.R.S. and F.S.A., an eminent local historian and topographer, was the eldest son of Sir Richard Hoare, the first baronet, and born in 1758. In 1793 he married the eldest daughter of lord Lyttleton; but his lady died in 1783, CLANCARTY, RICHARD LE POER TRENCH, earl of, a statesman and diplomatist, was born in 1707, and succeeded to the peerage on the death of his father in 1806. He was the intimate friend of lord Castlereagh, and held various offices under government. In 1807 he was sworn in a privy-councillor, and elected one of the representative peers for Ireland; in 1812, appointed master of the mint; and in 1813, president of the board of trade. On the restoration of the prince of Orange to the sovereignty of the Netherlands, the earl accompanied him thither, and was appointed ambassador-extraordinary at his court: went as one of the plenipotentiaries from the king of Great Britain to the congress of Vienna, in 1814; was created a peer of the United Kingdom in 1815; was again appointed ambassador-extraordinary to the Netherlands in 1816; remained there two years; and subsequently enjoyed a pension of 2,000*l.* a-year for his diplomatic services. At the time the king of the Netherlands conferred the title of prince of Waterloo upon the duke of Wellington, he expressed the high sense he entertained of the earl of Clancarty's services, by conferring on him the title of marquis of Heuden. He died Nov. 21, 1837.

COLEBROOKE, HENRY THOMAS, F.R.S., an eminent Orientalist, and director of the Royal Asiatic Society, was the third son of Sir George Colebrooke, bart., a director of the East India Company. He was born in 1763; made great progress in his classical and mathematical studies under a private tutor; and in 1782 was appointed to a writership in India. In a few years he obtained a situation in the revenue department; and being sent as one of a deputation to investigate the resources of a part of the country, it led to his publishing "Remarks on the Husbandry and Commerce of Bengal;" in which treatise he advocated a free trade between Great Britain and her Eastern possessions. Soon after this he began the study of the Sanscrit language, in which he subsequently became so eminent. The translation of the great "Digest of Hindû Law," which had been compiled under the direction of Sir W. Jones, but left unfinished at his death, was confided to Mr. Colebrooke; and while engaged in this work, he was appointed to a judicial situation at Mirzapore, where he completed it in 1796. His other works consist of a "Dictionary of the Sanscrit Language, by Amara Simha, with an English interpretation and annotations;" the "Algebra of the Hindoos;" and various treatises on their laws, philosophy, and arithmetic; besides numerous communications to the Society of which he was director. He died in March, 1837.

COLMAN, GEORGE, "the younger," an eminent dramatist and wit, son of George Colman, a sketch of whose life will be found in its proper alphabetical position, was born in 1762, and received his education at Westminster-school, Christchurch college, Oxford, and at King's college, Aberdeen; to which last he was sent, that he might be removed from the scenes of gaiety and dissipation with which the English university was rife. But neither the dread of scholastic discipline, nor the hope of academic honours, could check the exuberance of his wit, or divert his youthful fancy from the erratic course in which it delighted to stray. His father was desirous of seeing him at the bar; and on his return from college, he was entered a student of Lincoln's Inn. Circumstances, however, as well as inclination, led him to abandon the profession of the law, and betake himself to that for which he was so well qualified. In 1784, his first acknowledged play, called "Two to One," was brought forward, and introduced to the public by a prologue from the pen of his father, who announced it as the production of "a chip of the old block." The success of this exceeded his most sanguine expectations, and naturally strengthened his bias in favour of dramatic composition. In 1787 his celebrated opera of "Inkle and Yarico" appeared, and at once stamped his fame. Shortly after this, the elder Colman was attacked with paralysis, which terminating in mental imbecility, his son presided over the destinies of the Haymarket theatre, and subsequently became its proprietor, catering for the public amusement most felicitously. The prolific pen of "George Colman, the younger" seemed never idle; and yet, perhaps, there was scarcely a man in London who spent more hours in convivial pleasures, or whose brilliant flashes of wit so often "set the table in a roar." Our limits render it necessary that we should now merely enumerate his principal works; and this we will do as nearly as we can in chronological order: "The Mountaineers;" "The Iron Chest;" "The Heir at Law;" "Blue Beard;" "The Review, or Wags of Windsor;" "The Poor Gentleman;" "Love laughs at Locksmiths;" "John Bull;" "Who wants a Guinea;" "We fly by Night;" "The Africans;" and "X.Y.Z." These, with numerous preludes and interludes, prologues and epilogues, may be said to embrace his dramatic works: his other compositions, entitled "Random Records;" "My Nightgown and Slippers;" "Broad Grins;" "Poetical Vagaries;" "Vagaries Vindicated, or Hypocritic Hypercritics;" complete the list. For many of his plays he received large sums of money, and others filled the treasury at the Haymarket; yet, owing to various causes, he had to contend with great pecuniary embarrassments for many years: from which he was at length relieved by the kindness of George IV., who appointed him to the situation of licenser and examiner of plays, an office for which he was admirably qualified. He died Oct. 26, 1836.

of foot guards in 1784; was promoted to a captaincy in 1792; appointed aid-de-camp to major-general Hulse in 1794, and served in Flanders with the duke of York. In 1798 he was raised to the lieutenant-colonelcy of his regiment; went with it to Holland in 1799; and was severely wounded at the battle near the village of Schorel, Sept. 19. In 1803 he was appointed to the office of assistant adjutant-general to the north-west district; quitted it and went to Sicily in 1806; received the brevet of colonel in 1808; and in 1809 was employed in the expedition to the Scheldt. From 1811 to July, 1813, he was engaged in the Peninsular war (having attained the rank of major-general); and in November following, he went with the brigade of guards to Holland; where, having reduced and taken possession of Helvoet and Williamstadt, he joined the forces of Sir Thomas Graham. He commanded the first division of the guards at the battle of Waterloo, and there lost his right arm. On the death of the brave Sir Thomas Picton he was made colonel of the 77th regiment; was transferred to the 40th in 1834; and died at his seat, Harefield Park, in February, 1837.

COOPER, SIR ASTLEY PASTON, bart, a surgeon of distinguished celebrity, was a son of the Rev. S. Cooper, rector of Yelverton and Morley, Norfolk, and was born at Brooke, in that county, in 1768. He was placed with a medical gentleman at Yarmouth, in 1782, but was soon removed to London in order to attend the hospitals, and was articled to his uncle, W. Cooper, esq. then surgeon to Guy's hospital. With him, however, he remained but a few months, being transferred to Mr. Cline, in which situation his extraordinary aptitude for his profession quickly developed itself. In his twentieth year he went to Edinburgh, but quickly returned to London and took up his abode with Mr. Cline, his former instructor, who found him so able a coadjutor, in his situation of demonstrator to the students, as to assign him a share in his anatomical lectures also. In this prominent position he outshone all who had preceded him, not as a mere orator, but as a popular teacher who aimed to make himself plain and intelligible to his hearers. His class of students increased from 20 to 100, which was the largest ever known in London. Mr. Pettigrew, who has so well described the effect of Sir Astley's lectures and his surprising skill as an operator, says "he was the idol of the Borough school; the pupils followed him in troops,—listening with almost breathless anxiety to catch the observations which fell from his lips upon the several cases presented to his view. But on the days of operation, this feeling was wound up to the highest pitch—the sight was altogether deeply interesting; the large theatre of Guy's crowded to the ceiling—the profound silence obtained upon his entry—that person so manly and truly imposing, and the awful feeling connected with the occasion, can never be forgotten by any of his pupils. The elegance of his operations, without the slightest affectation, all ease, all kindness to the patient, and equally solicitous that nothing should be hidden from the observation of

"As a lecturer Sir Astley was remarkable for his spirit and animation. However serious his humour might chance to be, from the pressure of professional avocations and the deep and awful responsibility with which he was affected on every side, the assumption of his place in the lecture theatre seemed to throw new life into him, to impart a vigour to his frame, and to give full scope to his professional enthusiasm." In 1792 he visited Paris, and attended the lectures of Desault and Chopart; and on his return he took up his residence in the city, first in Jeffery-square and afterwards in Broad-street. His practice had now become immense; and long before he removed to New-street, Spring-gardens, he was decidedly affluent: while there he for many years realized from 18,000*l.* to 20,000*l.* per annum. Satisfied with the acquisition of a splendid fortune and a reputation for anatomical and surgical skill never surpassed, Sir Astley Cooper some years before his death retired for a time to the country, but he found that a life of quiescence and retirement would not suit his active mind, and he returned to London, once more to resume his professional avocations. Notwithstanding the immensity of his surgical operations, and the time he devoted to anatomical and physiological inquiries, he still found time to publish several works of great utility; but his imperishable fame rests mainly upon his accurate anatomical knowledge, and the extraordinary facility with which he performed the most difficult operations in surgery. The honour of a baronetcy was conferred on him at the coronation of George IV. to whom he had been appointed surgeon. Died Feb. 12, 1841, aged 72.

COX, Mrs. LETITIA. The name of this female, who died at Bybrook, in Jamaica, June 26, 1838, is inserted here as affording the most surprising instance of longevity to be met with in modern times. By her own account she was a grown-up young woman at the time of the destruction of Port Royal by an earthquake (June 9, 1692), so that she must have been upwards of 160 years of age. It is worthy of observation also, and especially interesting to those who advocate the "temperance" system, that she declared she never drank anything but water during her whole life.

DALHOUSIE, Right Hon. GEORGE RAMSAY, earl of, a British general, born in 1770, was the eldest son of George, the eighth earl of Dalhousie, and entered the army as a cornet in the dragoon guards in 1789. He was successively a captain in the Royals, major, and lieutenant-colonel in the 2d foot, and colonel of the 26th; received the rank of major-general in 1805; was promoted to that of lieutenant-general in 1813, and G.C.B.; was appointed captain-general and governor-in-chief of the forces in North America in 1819; and attained the full rank of general in 1830. He commenced his active military career at Martinique in 1792; served in Ireland during the rebellion

CLANCARTY, RICHARD LE POER TRENCH, earl of, a statesman and diplomatist, was born in 1767, and succeeded to the peerage on the death of his father in 1803. He was the intimate friend of lord Castlereagh, and held various offices under government. In 1807 he was sworn in a privy-councillor, and elected one of the representative peers for Ireland; in 1812, appointed master of the mint; and in 1813, president of the board of trade. On the restoration of the prince of Orange to the sovereignty of the Netherlands, the earl accompanied him thither, and was appointed ambassador-extraordinary at his court; went as one of the plenipotentiaries from the king of Great Britain to the congress of Vienna, in 1814; was created a peer of the United Kingdom in 1815; was again appointed ambassador-extraordinary to the Netherlands in 1816; remained there two years; and subsequently enjoyed a pension of 2,000*l.* a-year for his diplomatic services. At the time the king of the Netherlands conferred the title of prince of Waterloo upon the duke of Wellington, he expressed the high sense he entertained of the earl of Clancarty's services, by conferring on him the title of marquis of Heusden. He died Nov. 31, 1837.

COLEBROOKE, HENRY THOMAS, F.R.S., an eminent Orientalist, and director of the Royal Asiatic Society, was the third son of Sir George Colebrooke, bart., a director of the East India Company. He was born in 1765; made great progress in his classical and mathematical studies under a private tutor; and in 1782 was appointed to a writership in India. In a few years he obtained a situation in the revenue department; and being sent as one of a deputation to investigate the resources of a part of the country, it led to his publishing "Remarks on the Husbandry and Commerce of Bengal;" in which treatise he advocated a free trade between Great Britain and her Eastern possessions. Soon after this he began the study of the Sanscrit language, in which he subsequently became so eminent. The translation of the great "Digest of Hindû Law," which had been compiled under the direction of Sir W. Jones, but left unfinished at his death, was confided to Mr. Colebrooke; and while engaged in this work, he was appointed to a judicial situation at Mirzapore, where he completed it in 1796. His other works consist of a "Dictionary of the Sanscrit Language, by Amera Simha, with an English interpretation and annotations;" the "Algebra of the Hindoos;" and various treatises on their laws, philosophy, and arithmetic; besides numerous communications to the Society of which he was director. He died in March, 1837.

COLMAN, GEORGE, "the younger," an eminent dramatist and wit, son of George Colman, a sketch of whose life will be found in its proper alphabetical position), was born in 1762, and received his education at Westminster-school, Christchurch college, Oxford, and at King's college, Aberdeen; to which last he was sent, that he might be removed from the scenes of gaiety and dissipation with which the English university was rife. But neither the dread of scholastic discipline, nor the hope of academic honours, could check the exuberance of his wit, or divert his youthful fancy from the erratic course in which it delighted to stray. His father was desirous of seeing him at the bar; and on his return from college, he was entered a student of Lincoln's Inn. Circumstances, however, as well as inclination, led him to abandon the profession of the law, and betake himself to that for which he was so well qualified. In 1764, his first acknowledged play, called "Two to One," was brought forward, and introduced to the public by a prologue from the pen of his father, who announced it as the production of "a chip of the old block." The success of this exceeded his most sanguine expectations, and naturally strengthened his bias in favour of dramatic composition. In 1767 his celebrated opera of "Tink and Yarico" appeared, and at once stamped his fame. Shortly after this, the elder Colman was attacked with palsy, which terminating in mental imbecility, his son presided over the destinies of the Haymarket theatre, and subsequently became its proprietor, catering for the public amusement most felicitously. The prolific pen of "George Colman, the younger," seemed never idle; and yet, perhaps, there was scarcely a man in London who spent more hours in convivial pleasures, or whose brilliant flashes of wit so often "set the table in a roar." Our limits render it necessary that we should now merely enumerate his principal works; and this we will do as nearly as we can in chronological order: "The Mountaineers;" "The Iron Chest;" "The Heir at Law;" "Blue Beard;" "The Review, or Wags of Windsor;" "The Poor Gentleman;" "Love laughs at Locksmiths;" "John Bull;" "Who wants a Guinea?" "We fly by Night;" "The Africans;" and "X.Y.Z." These, with numerous preludes and interludes, prologues and epilogues, may be said to embrace his dramatic works: his other compositions, entitled "Random Records;" "My Nightgown and Slippers;" "Broad Grins;" "Poetical Vagaries;" "Vagaries Vindicated, or Hypocritic Hypercritics;" complete the list. of 1798; was present in all the actions of the campaign in Holland; distinguished himself under Sir Ralph Abercromby in Egypt; and commanded the 7th division in the Peninsula. This gallant officer died at Dalhousie Castle, near Edinburgh, March 21, 1835.

DANIELL, WILLIAM, R.A., an eminent draughtsman, was initiated in the pictorial art at a very early age, and accompanied his uncle to India, when he was only fourteen, for the express purpose of assisting in depicting the scenery, costume, &c. of that interesting country. During the ten years of their absence from England, they travelled many thousand miles, commencing their arduous journey at Cape Comorin, and closing it at Serinagur, in the Himalaya Mountains. Immediately on their return, the large work, entitled "Oriental Scenery," in six folio volumes, was commenced, and continued with the most persevering ardour, until its completion in 1808. He also published "A Picturesque Voyage to India;" a work entitled "Zoography;" and a great variety of separate views, &c. In 1814, he commenced the "Voyage round Great Britain," a most gigantic undertaking for an unassisted individual. Two or three months in each summer were devoted to collect drawings and notes, and the work was finished in 1825. During these solitary journeys he was subject to great fatigue, wretched fare, and still more wretched accommodation. In 1832, Mr. Daniell, and his friend Mr. Parrie, executed the "Panorama of Madras;" and he subsequently painted two others, without assistance, namely, the "City of Lucknow," and the "Mode of Hunting Wild Elephants in Ceylon." He was particularly successful in depicting the ocean in all its varied aspects; and his glowing representations of Eastern scenery are well known to the public by his splendid "Oriental Annual." He died in August, 1837.

D'ARBLAY, Madame (formerly Miss Burney), was the daughter of Dr. Burney, the celebrated composer and author, and may be reckoned among the most distinguished novelists of the last century; her first work "Evelina," having created a greater sensation among the literati of her time, than was probably ever caused by any similar production. Her other chief works were "Cecilia, or the Memoirs of an Heiress;" "Canilla, or a Picture of Youth;" "The Wanderer, or Female Difficulties;" and "Memoirs of Dr. Burney." In 1793 she was married to M. D'Arblay, a French emigrant artillery officer; and having quitted England for a short residence at Paris during the peace of 1802, their detention by Napoleon was the consequence. Her husband afterwards resumed his rank in the army of his native country; and they continued to remain in France till the peace of 1814, when they came to England, and took up their residence at Bath. In that city M. D'Arblay (then a general) died, in 1818. There also died Madame D'Arblay, Jan. 6, 1840.

DAVIDSON, JOHN, a celebrated traveller, was the son of Mr. Davidson, an opulent tailor, in Cork-street. In 1814, he was apprenticed to Messrs. Savory and Moore, chemists, and became a partner in that firm at the expiration of his time; but his inclination for travel, induced him to quit the business in 1826; and from that period up to the time of his death, he had been almost constantly engaged in exploring distant regions. He visited North and South America, India, Egypt, Syria, Palestine, Greece, Italy, France, and Germany; enriching his mind with the most valuable information, and afterwards imparting it to the public in his lectures. His last expedition was to Africa, and it proved a fatal one. Whilst vainly attempting to reach the great object of European curiosity, the far-famed city of Timbuctoo, and when about twenty-five days' journey from it, (near the southern confines of the district of Egeda), he was robbed and murdered by a party of the tribe of El Harib, Dec. 18, 1836. The activity and perseverance of this intrepid traveller, combined with a rare union of physical advantages, and a gentle and conciliating disposition, would, it was confidently expected, have ensured his success. He had insured himself to great bodily privations, and was thoroughly conversant with the languages and customs of the East; but the treachery, cruelty, and dishonesty of the people through whose territories Mr. Davidson was passing, have at all times rendered it an undertaking of infinite hazard, if not of absolute hopelessness.

DIBDIN, THOMAS, a dramatic author and song-writer, was the eldest son of the celebrated Charles Dibdin, whose "naval songs" he was engaged in editing at the time of his death, and whose memoir will be found in the body of this work. He had the honour of having Garrick for his godfather, and in 1775, when only four years of age he appeared on the stage as Cupid, in Shakspeare's "Jubilee," to the Venus of Mrs. Siddons. At sixteen he was apprentice to Mr. (afterwards Sir William) Rawlins, to learn the trade of an upholsterer; but born and bred to "the profession," it was no wonder that after a few years he quitted the shop, and sought his fortune on the boards of various provincial theatres. From that time until 1795 he is said to have performed in every department of the drama, and written more than 1000 songs. He afterwards obtained an engagement at Covent Garden theatre; and numerous were the operas, farces, and entertainments which for that and other establishments, were produced by his fertile and inventive genius, during the term of half a century. From among them we may select "The Cabinet," "The English Fleet," "Mother Goose," (which yielded more than 20,000*l.* profit to the managers of Covent Garden theatre), "The High-mettled Racer," (a clear gain to the proprietors of Astley's of 13,000*l.*), "The Jew and Doctor," "Past Ten o'Clock," &c. &c. But, alas! prolific as was his brain, and successful as were his pieces, the latter days of his long and active life were uncheered by the result of his previous labours. Died, Sept. 1841.

DRUMMOND, THOMAS, under secretary of state for Ireland. Very early in life he was distinguished for his mathematical proficiency, and when he became private secretary to lord Althorp, who was then chancellor of the exchequer, his punctuality in attendance to his official duties, and the at once tried and unpretending plainness of the various official communications which his positions obliged him to make, as well to public bodies as to individuals, marked him, in the opinion of those who were best able to appreciate such qualities, and who, fortunately for the public service, had both the will and the power to reward and employ them, as the fittest possible person for the situation of under-secretary for Ireland—as difficult a post, from circumstances to which we need not allude, as any in the whole range of our civil service. But the cares of office did not prevent him from indulging his taste for study and experimental service; one of the fruits of which is the brilliant light which he invented, and which bears his name. The calculations upon which the schedules of the parliamentary reform bill were based, were made by him; and although they were subjected to the severe test of the minutest examination of the highly-gifted men who opposed that measure on general grounds, and were naturally inclined to look with great caution, not to say hostility, upon everything that had a tendency to justify it, the most rigid scrutiny only raised his character for accuracy. Died, 1840.

DUMARESQUÉ, LIEUT.-COLONEL HENRY, who at the time of his death was chief commissioner of the Australian company in New South Wales, entered the army as a lieutenant in the 9th foot, at the age of sixteen; and served in eight campaigns, of which six were in the Peninsula, one in Canada, and the last that of Waterloo. He was present in the thirteen battles for which medals were bestowed, and at several sieges; attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel after nine years service; was employed on the staff upwards of eighteen years; and was twice dangerously wounded. At the battle of Waterloo he was on the staff of General Sir John Byng, and was shot through the lungs at Hougoumont; but being at the time charged with a message for the duke of Wellington, he, as if supported by the resolution to do his duty, rode up to the duke, delivered his message, and then, as Sir Walter Scott describes it, dropped from his horse, to all appearance a dying man. The ball, which was never extracted, is supposed to have eventually induced paralysis, and caused his death, March, 1838.

DURHAM, Right Hon. JOHN GEORGE LAMTON, earl of, was the eldest son of W. H. Lamton, esq., of Lamton castle, M. P. for the city of Durham, by lady Anne Villiers, daughter of the earl of Jersey. He was educated at Eton, served in the 10th hussars, and at the age of twenty married Miss Harriet Cholmondeley, by whom he had three daughters, all now deceased. In 1815 this lady died; and in the following year he formed a matrimonial alliance with lady Louisa Elizabeth, the second daughter of earl Grey. During the whole of his parliamentary career he denounced Tory influence, and steadily adhered to the doctrine of reform as originally propounded by his noble father-in-law; but in 1827 we find him a supporter of Mr. Canning's ministry, and on the dissolution of lord Goderich's cabinet in 1828, he was raised to the peerage by the title of baron Durham. On the formation of earl Grey's government in 1830, he became a member of the cabinet, as lord privy seal; and to him is mainly attributed the great extent and liberality of the reform bill, and its eventual triumph. He was now hailed as the great leader of the movement party, and became a popular idol; his presence was eagerly solicited at all the great radical meetings, and his admirers were on tiptoe in the expectation that he would be raised to the head of public affairs. In 1835 his lordship went to Russia as ambassador, and remained there till the summer of 1837, when he returned to England; and in the following year he went out as governor-general to Canada, entrusted with extraordinary powers; but finding himself not supported as he expected by the ministry, he returned home the same year. So opposite have been the sentiments with regard to lord Durham's general policy and his qualifications as a statesman, that to a mind disposed to be impartial it is difficult to form a correct opinion of them; but we believe we may safely reiterate the following encomium on him;—"From his first appearance on the field of politics to the last, no man ever thought of even doubting his rectitude and determined adherence to his conscientious convictions." Born, April 12, 1792; died, July 28, 1840.

DYER, GEORGE, a classical scholar and miscellaneous writer, whose long life of literary toil may in some sort be exemplified by quoting from the "Gentleman's Magazine," the following mournful record:—"The greatest labour of his life was the share he had in the production of Valpy's edition of the Classics in 141 volumes; being a combination of the Delphin, Bipont, and Variorum editions. With the exception of the preface, Dyer contributed all that was original in this vast work, upon which he was engaged from the year 1819 to 1830! He had scarcely completed this work when his eye-sight gave way, and shortly afterwards left him in total blindness." The writer adds, (and let us not grudge the space which the unaffected tribute occupies), "The memory of George Dyer will be ever cherished by his friends as of one who passed through the world without having contracted one blemish of worldliness; his guileless simplicity endeared him especially to his friend Charles Lamb, who would often, indeed, indulge his humorous vein at the expense of one whom he knew to be of an invulnerable innocence, but who has also declared, that in doing so, it was his ambition to make familiar to the public, a character which, for integrity and single-heartedness, he has long been accustomed to rank among the best patterns of his species." Mr. Dyer was born in 1755; received his education at Christ's Hospital and Emanuel College, Cambridge; and died in 1841, aged 85. His writings are varied and numerous; historical, poetical, classical, and political; amongst them his "History of the University and Colleges of Cambridge, 2 vols.," and "The Privileges of the University of Cambridge, &c. &c." 2 vols., are the most important.

EGREMONT, GEORGE O'BRIEN WYNDHAM, earl of, was born in 1751, and succeeded to the peerage when he was only twelve years old. This illustrious nobleman displayed throughout the whole course of his long and useful life a liberal spirit and patrician magnificence; upholding the character of the English gentleman, by his intellectual acquirements, and by the noble exercise of a wide-spreading benevolence. Though he never took a very prominent part in the discussions of the legislature, he enjoyed much political consideration; and in times of pressure and peril, his purse, his example, and his exertions were nobly devoted to his country's cause. On the death of the late duke of Richmond, in 1819, he was appointed lord lieutenant of Sussex, which office he resigned in 1836, on account of his increasing infirmities, to the present duke of Richmond. His mansion at Petworth contained the noblest productions of genius, including one of the best libraries in the kingdom; and in his patronage of British artists he pre-eminently excelled; "not confining his support to one class of art, but encouraging all classes wherein genius and taste worthy of encouragement presented themselves." When the earl succeeded to the title and estates, the yearly rental amounted to not quite 45,000*l.* per annum, which at the time of his decease had been increased to 81,000*l.*; and in the last sixty years he had distributed in acts of charity and liberality the immense sum of one million two hundred thousand pounds, or about 20,000*l.* per annum! His lordship died Nov. 11, 1837, aged 85.

ELDON, JOHN SCOTT, earl of, a distinguished lawyer and statesman, who for twenty-five years filled the office of lord high chancellor of England, was the third son of William Scott, coal-fitter, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and a younger brother of the late lord Stowell. He was born on the 4th of June, 1751, (the birth-day of his friend and master, George III.); and, after receiving the rudiments of his education at the grammar-school of Newcastle, was admitted a commoner of University college, Oxford. He was elected Fellow in 1767; gained the chancellor's prize, "On the Advantages and Disadvantages of Foreign Travel," in 1771; and there was every prospect of his obtaining college preferment, had he remained single. Having, however, contracted a marriage with Miss Sartree, a young lady of Newcastle, he resolved on making the law his profession, and so that end he studied late and early. In 1772, he was admitted a member of the Middle Temple; but he resided chiefly in or near Oxford, till he was called to the bar in 1776. Years of laborious study passed away, with little encouragement to him, and he had seriously resolved to quit London, to practise as a provincial counsel in his native town; but his knowledge and application had not been unobserved by some of the brightest ornaments of the profession; they persuaded him to remain, assuring him his success was certain; and the result quickly proved the correctness of their predictions, for he shortly after became the leader on the northern circuit. In 1783 Mr. Scott came into parliament for the borough of Weobly, and attached himself to the party of Mr. Pitt, who was his personal friend; but his senatorial speeches were not equal to his forensic oratory; though shrewd and clear, they were deficient in that declamatory vehemence which is often found to be persuasive, where the most logical arguments would fail to convince. His progress towards the highest legal honours now appeared certain: he was made solicitor-general in 1788, and knighted; became attorney-general in 1793; when, among the manifold duties which at that time devolved on the office, was the memorable trial of Hardy, Horne Tooke, and others, on a charge of high-treason. Upon that occasion, Sir John Scott, who had ineffectually opposed the prosecution, evinced consummate skill; and, in a speech of nine hours duration, evoked the immense mass of evidence in support of the indictment. The result was an acquittal, which was regarded by the people as a great triumph, and was precisely what he had foretold, at the time he recommended ministers to have the prisoners indicted for a misdemeanor. In 1796 Sir John Scott was returned for Boroughbridge, as the colleague of Sir Francis Burdett; succeeded Sir James Eyre as lord chief justice of the Common Pleas; and in July, 1799, was raised to the peerage as baron Eldon, of Eldon, in the county of Durham. In 1801 he became lord high chancellor of England, and in the same year was elected high steward of the university of Oxford, when the degree of D.C.L. was conferred on him. In February, 1806, his lordship resigned the great seal; but was re-appointed in April, 1807, from which period he held it until April 20, 1827, being altogether nearly twenty-five years. At the coronation of George IV. the lord chancellor was promoted to the dignities of viscount Encombe and earl of Eldon. He died at his house in Hamilton-place, London, Jan. 13, 1835, being in his 87th year. Lady Eldon died in 1831. His whole life was an example of unremitting diligence in the most arduous of all pro-lessons; and there are few who will dispute the character given of him by that able and upright advocate, Sir Samuel Romilly, who in the House of Commons declared, "there never was a man in the court of chancery who more endeared himself to the bar, or exhibited more humane attention to the suitors: there never presided in that court a man of more deep and various learning in his profession; and in anxiety to do justice, that court had never seen, he would not say the superior, but the equal, of the lord chancellor. If he had a fault, it was an over-anxiety to do justice." Of his politics we have no intention to speak: they will yet be viewed through the various lights and shades of party feeling; it may, however, be just necessary to observe, that on the two great questions, Catholic Emancipation and Parliamentary Reform, he was ever the inflexible opponent; but no one, with due reflection, will attribute to lord Eldon a want of integrity, or a departure from any principle which he conscientiously believed would tend to the good of his country. His lordship's personal property was sworn under 700,000*l.*, the greater part of which, together with the estates, he bequeathed to his grandson, the present earl.

ELGIN, the Right Hon. THOMAS BRUCE, earl of ELGIN and KINCARDINE, was born in 1771, succeeded to the peerage in his childhood, and received his education at Harrow and Westminster schools, and at the university of St. Andrew's. His lordship entered the foot guards in 1785, and attained to the rank of general in 1837. On many occasions the earl of Elgin was honoured with diplomatic missions, the last of which was as ambassador extraordinary to the Sublime Porte, in 1799, where he continued till the French were finally driven out of Egypt. Being desirous of rescuing the remains of Greece also from destruction and oblivion, he availed himself of the opportunities of his station, and succeeded in forming a vast collection of statues, specimens of architecture, medals, and other valuable antiquities, which were eventually purchased by government for 35,000*l.* and deposited in the British Museum. Much censure has been lavished by lord Byron and others on the earl of Elgin for removing these antiquities from Athens; but if it be true, as is asserted, that the cost, including interest of money, amounted to 74,000*l.* the "mercantile spirit" with which he has been charged is altogether without foundation, inasmuch as he lost more than one half of that sum in endeavouring to secure these invaluable treasures. Died, at Paris Nov. 1841, aged 73.

ELLEY, Lieutenant-general Sir JOHN, a distinguished English officer, whose services are the more worthy of record, because, by his own sheer merit, he rose to almost the highest military rank, and to a host of other honours, to which we shall presently have to allude, from the very humble situation of a private in the royal horse guards blue. The exact date of his enlistment we do not know; but, after passing through the inferior grades, and serving with great credit as a quartermaster, he, in 1791, obtained a cornetcy in the blues. He served in the campaigns of the Low Countries in 1793, and two following years, and was present at nearly every action, including the siege of Valenciennes. By the year 1806, he had fought his way up to a lieutenant-colonelcy; in 1808 and 1809 he served as assistant adjutant-general to the cavalry in Spain; and was present at all the sanguinary affairs in that country and Portugal throughout the remainder of the Peninsular war. He subsequently served in the Netherlands, and was at the final shock of battle, "Waterloo," where he was serviceable not merely as an officer, but even as an individual trooper; for we read in Sir Walter Scott's "Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk," that several of Napoleon's cuirassiers were found cleft to the very chine by Elley's stalwart arm. In addition to his high military rank, and the profitable as well as honourable colonelcy of the 17th lancers, Sir John was K.C.B.; K.C.H.; K.M.T.; K.S.G.; and governor of Galway. Died, 1839.

FAGEL, HENRY, baron, a Dutch statesman, and formerly ambassador from Holland to Great Britain. He was strongly attached to the house of Orange, and consequently partook of the misfortunes which befel that family during the triumph of French principles in his native country; but he returned to it with the stadtholder, and was much engaged in the diplomatic acts of his government. Died, 1836.

FANE, General Sir HENRY, commander-in-chief in India, and colonel of the 1st dragoon guards, was born in 1778, and entered the army as a cornet in the dragoon guards when in his 15th year. In this regiment he received regular promotion, till, in 1803, he was removed to the lieutenant-colonelcy of the 1st or king's dragoon guards. In 1806 he was appointed brigadier-general, accompanied Sir Arthur Wellesley to Portugal, and was afterwards attached to the army of Sir John Moore, commanding a brigade, and assisting in all the operations of that disastrous campaign. He subsequently had the command of a brigade of cavalry, and was present at Talavera and many other battles during 1810 and 1811; but, suffering greatly from ill health, he was obliged to resign his command, and return to England. His health being restored, in 1813 he again resumed his duties in the Peninsula, and commanded the cavalry and horse artillery at the battles of Orthes and Toulouse. On his arrival at home, he was promoted to the colonelcy of the 23rd light dragoons, from which he was soon removed to the 4th dragoon guards, and appointed inspector of cavalry. He was next placed in command of the cavalry and horse artillery of the British army of occupation in France; and in 1819 received the brevet of lieutenant-general. In 1827 he was appointed to the colonelcy of the 1st dragoon guards, and in 1837 attained the full rank of general. Died, 1840.

bers for Rye. He subsequently represented Midhurst, Wendover, and Haslemere; was appointed secretary of state for Ireland in 1806; became postmaster-general, from which office he retired in 1830, and was created baron Farnborough. His lordship possessed considerable taste for literature and the fine arts; was on terms of intimacy and held office with Mr. Pitt; and he had the honour of enjoying the private friendship of George IV., who consulted him on all subjects connected with the improvement of the royal palaces, the purchase of paintings, &c. Died, Jan. 17, 1838.

FAWCETT, JOHN, an eminent theatrical performer, was the son of an actor of humble pretensions at Drury-lane, and was born in London, in 1769. At the age of fifteen, he was apprenticed to a linen-draper, but being born, as it were, to the stage, he disdained all other occupations, and clandestinely left the shop for the Margate theatre, where under the name of Foote he made his first appearance. He afterwards joined Tate Wilkinson on the York circuit; and in 1791 made his bow to a London audience, at Covent-garden, as Caleb, in "He would be a Soldier." It was not till some years after this, that his acting attracted much notice, though his celebrated song of "What's a Woman like!" and the mock Italian bravura, "Maestro was an Opera Singer," were highly applauded. His dramatic reputation was, however, at once fixed by his representation of Doctor Pangloss, Orlapod, Caleb Quotem, and Job Thornberry. In 1798 he joined the Haymarket company, and became acting-manager, in 1800, of that theatre. In 1813 he appeared at the English Opera, and in 1816 rejoined the Haymarket. He afterwards became manager of Covent-garden theatre, which situation he held till his retreat from the stage, in 1836. Owing to some domestic misfortunes, Mr. Fawcett, for the few last years of his life was a pensioner on the Covent-garden Theatrical Fund, of which he had for a long period been treasurer. In private life his conduct was irreproachable, but there was a bluntness in his manners, which, to a stranger, often appeared like intentional rudeness. He died at Botley, Hants, in March, 1837.

FERGUSON, the Right Hon. ROBERT CUTLAR, an eminent lawyer and statesman. He was in early life considered to be somewhat dangerously violent in his politics; and being in court during the trial of Arthur O'Connor for high treason, he joined others in endeavouring to rescue the prisoner. For this attempt he was imprisoned for one year, at the expiration of which he complied with the intreaties of his friends (who deemed him in actual danger in England, on account of his politics), and sailed for India. There he devoted himself wholly to his profession, and became so distinguished in it, that he acted as attorney-general while the office was vacant by the retirement of that officer, and the non-arrival of his successor. Having returned home with a large fortune, he in 1826 contested the election of the stewardry of Kirkcudbright, and was returned member, though only by a majority of one. He was a tolerable parliamentary orator, and being a constant supporter of Whig principles, he was raised by Lord Melbourne's government to the office of judge advocate, and sworn of the privy council in 1834. He resigned during the short subsequent administration of Sir R. Peel; but was restored to office on the return to power of Lord Melbourne. Born, 1770; died, 1839.

FESCH, His Eminence JOSEPH, senior priest-cardinal of the sacred college, and archbishop of Lyons. By the maternal side he was brother of Letitia Ramolini, mother of Napoleon Buonaparte. He was born at Ajaccio, in Corsica, about six years before the island fell under the subjection of the French. At the age of thirteen he was sent to complete his education in France, and was still in that country when the Revolution broke out. Young and ardent, he instantly became attached to the new state of things, threw off the clerical attire of the seminary at which he was studying, and entered the army of Montesquieu, in Switzerland, in the capacity of a store-keeper; and in 1795 we find him holding the important and lucrative appointment of commissary-general to the army of Italy, which was then commanded by his nephew, Buonaparte—an appointment in which he saved, what may without exaggeration be called, a princely fortune. Having done so, and rightly judging that the interest of his nephew would sooner or later stand him in good stead at Rome, he retired from the army, resumed his clerical studies and profession, and in 1802 was, by the cardinal legate in person, consecrated archbishop of Lyons. Early in the following year he received a cardinal's hat, and went to Rome as ambassador from France. He was received at Rome with peculiar distinction; but it would seem that the cardinal's hat, any more than the monk's hood, does not always cover true piety. His luxurious way of living, and a certain air of the camp that appeared both in his men and in his conversation, gave considerable scandal to the graver Romans—and that scandal was especially increased by his obstinately persisting in giving concerts at his palace, even in Lent, in defiance of a particular and very strict order to the contrary. As if to show his utter contempt alike of the order and of the feeling that dictated it, he actually sent a circular of invitation to his concerts to the whole of the cardinals!—not one of whom, to their credit be it said, would attend. In 1804 the cardinal accompanied Pius VII. to Paris, and assisted in the consecration of Napoleon; by whom, in the following year, he was made grand almoner of France, a principal officer of the Legion of Honour, and a member of the senate. In 1806 the elector arch-chancellor of the Germanic empire nominated him his coadjutor and successor, and the king of Spain decorated him with the order of the Golden Fleece. As president of the council of Paris, he opposed his self-willed nephew in many of his unjust schemes, and both boldly and constantly, though ineffectually, protested against the violence with which he insulted and ill-treated the unfortunate pope. It says very much for the goodness of his heart that he braved the implacable temper, which he well knew his nephew to possess, rather than sanction, even by his silence, the ill-treatment of a fallen old man, from whom in the then state of the world, nothing could reasonably be hoped. Napoleon, who was as incapable of sympathizing with such true greatness of mind as he was of practising it, showed how deeply he felt his uncle's opposition by depriving him of his succession to the arch-chancellorship, and nominating in his stead Eugene Beauharnois, with the title of Grand Duke of Frankfurt. When his disgrace with the emperor was thus published, he retired at first to Lyons, and subsequently to Rome, where, with Madame Buonaparte, he lived a quiet but most luxurious life. His library and picture gallery were the finest that even Rome, that city of the arts, could boast. Born, 1764; died, 1839.

FITZHERBERT, MARIA ANNE, a lady who at one period of her life occupied too prominent a place in the history of the country, for her name to be passed by silently at her decease, was the sister of the late Walter Smythe, esq. of Bambridge, near Winchester, and was married in 1775 to Edward Weld, esq. of Lutworth castle, uncle to the late cardinal Weld. Her husband died, without issue, within a twelve-month from the day of marriage, and she was soon after united to Thomas Fitzherbert, esq., who also died, leaving no offspring, in 1781. Having found it necessary to allude to Mrs. Fitzherbert, at some length, in our memoir of George IV., we shall avoid repeating the facts there stated, merely observing that, attracted by the beauty and fascination of the blooming widow, the prince urgently pressed his suit, and a marriage, according to the forms of the Catholic church, is believed (but never was thoroughly ascertained) to have taken place about 1797. She naturally became the object of great public and political interest; but the influence she possessed was always exercised for the honour of him to whom she was united; and she found, after her retirement from the meretricious splendour that had once surrounded her, ample means for the employment of her mind, in acts of unostentatious benevolence. Died, March, 1837.

FITZJAMES, EDWARD, duke of, was the great grandson of the duke of Berwick, who was natural son of James II. of England, by a sister of the duke of Marlborough. At the time of the French Revolution, the name of the duke of Fitzjames was placed on the list of proscription, in consequence of his having emigrated; but, at the restoration of the Bourbon family, he returned to France, and became aid-de-camp and first nobleman of the chamber to the comte d'Artois, afterwards Charles X. In the chamber of peers he was remarkable for the constancy yet moderation with which he upheld the monarch. After the revolution of 1830, he was no less a favoured person than before it, having readily sworn allegiance to the new state of things. He is chiefly noticeable as being in some sort a member of our ill-fated Stuart family. Died, 1839.

FONBLANQUE, JOHN DE GRENIER, an eminent barrister, was descended from a noble family in the south of France, some of whom, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, came to England, and founded the celebrated house of agency, into which they subsequently admitted as a partner, Mr. Thelluson, originally their book-keeper, but who afterwards realized that prodigious fortune which has since so often occupied public attention, through its singular testamentary disposition. John Fonblanque, the subject of this article, was born in 1739; received his education at Harrow and Oxford; and in 1763 was called to the bar. In 1790, he acted as leading counsel for the London merchants, in opposition to the Quebec bill, at the bar of the House of Commons. In 1793 appeared his celebrated "Treatise on Equity," which went through several editions, and is regarded by the courts as an authority on the subject. In 1802 he was elected M.P. for Camelford, and continued a member until the dissolution in 1806. In 1804 he obtained a silk gown with a patent of precedence, and for many years enjoyed an extensive equity practice. He was an able advocate of the Whig party, and a personal friend of the prince of Wales, for whom he now is supposed to have written the celebrated letters to the king, on the subject of his royal highness' exclusion from the army, which were generally attributed to lord Moira. He died, Jan. 4, 1837. His sons are men of eminence in their respective vocations; John Samuel Martin Fonblanque, esq., is commissioner of bankrupts; and Albany Fonblanque, esq., a writer of no ordinary calibre, is editor of "The Examiner."

FOSBROOKE, REV. THOMAS DUDLEY, F.S.A., a learned and industrious antiquary and archaeologist, was born in 1770, and received his education at St. Paul's school, London, and Pembroke college, Oxford. Mr. Fosbrooke commenced his literary career in 1796, with a poem entitled "The Economy of Monastic Life;" and in 1799 he produced his "British Monachism," 2 vols. 8vo., having previously applied himself with extraordinary diligence to the study of the Saxon language. His next great work was the "History of Gloucestershire," in 2 vols. 4to., and in 1819 appeared his "History of the City of Gloucester." These were followed by "The Wye Tour," "Ariconsensia," and the "Berkeley Manuscripts." In 1824 he published his most important work, the "Encyclopædia of Antiquities, and Elements of Archaeology," 2 vols. 4to.; and in 1828, a kind of sequel to it, called "Foreign Topography." "The Tourist's Grammar," and several other works also appeared from his pen; and he was for many years a prolific contributor to the "Gentleman's Magazine." Mr. Fosbrooke's church preferment was as scanty as his literary industry was great. For sixteen years he officiated as curate of Horsley, in Gloucestershire; during the next twenty years he was curate of Walford, (on the banks of the Wye); and for the last twelve years of his life he was its vicar. This worthy man and learned antiquary died on New-year's-day, 1842.

than of biography to describe the events, important though they be, which distinguish the reign of a monarch: we shall therefore observe, generally, that during all the extraordinary vicissitudes to which he and his country were subjected by the successes of Napoleon, his conduct and firm unbending character ensured for him the confidence of his army and the regard of all his subjects who were not imbued with the widely spreading doctrines of republicanism. To the king of Prussia is principally attributed the duration of so long a peace: he it was who admitted Louis Philippe amongst the legitimate sovereigns of the continent, and allowed of the marriage of the latter's eldest son, which has consolidated his throne and perpetuated his race. He died at Berlin, June 7, 1840.

GALT, JOHN, a voluminous author on a great variety of subjects, but chiefly known as a novelist. His novels are in general laid in Scotland, and his quaint phraseology and intimate acquaintance with every light and shadow of Scottish life, make them really important to all who would know Scotland—especially the Scotland of middle and lower life—as it really is. The list of his works is formidably long: perhaps the best of them are, "The Entail," "The Annals of the Parish," "The Ayrshire Legatees," and "Rungan Gilhalze." Independent of his numerous novels, he published tragedies, minor poems, voyages and travels, and several biographies. He was for some time editor of the "Courier" newspaper, with a salary of 800*l.* a-year, and it is asserted that he gave up that appointment rather than allow the insertion, though at the request of a minister, of an article which he considered objectionable. For several years previous to his death he suffered very severely from paralysis of the limbs. Born, 1780; died, 1839.

GARROW, the Right Hon. Sir WILLIAM, was the second son of the Rev. D. Garrow, of Monkton Hadley, Middlesex, where he was born in 1760. Having been placed under Mr. Southouse, a special pleader, he was called to the bar in 1783, and soon distinguished himself by his acuteness and knowledge of the law. In 1793 he became king's counsel; attorney-general to the prince of Wales in 1805; solicitor-general to the crown in 1812; attorney-general in 1814; chief justice of Chester in the same year; and a baron of the court of exchequer in 1817. He held that office till 1832; and in compliment to his long and valuable judicial services, was sworn a member of the privy council. From this time he lived in retirement at his marine villa, Pegwell Cottage, near Ramsgate. Died, aged 60, Sept. 1840.

GENEST, Rev. JOHN, was educated at Westminster, whence he removed, as a pensioner, to Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became a scholar at the commencement of the second year of his residence. After officiating for very many years as curate of a retired village in Lancashire, he was appointed private chaplain to the duke of Ancaster. Though he is believed to have been a rather voluminous writer, he has left but one published work, "The History of the English Stage, from 1660 to 1830." Born, 1765; died, 1840.

GILBERT, DAVIES, an eminent man of science, vice-president of the Royal Society, and member of numerous other learned and scientific societies. His family name was Giddy, and he was born at St. Erth, in Cornwall. In 1708 he married the daughter of a wealthy Sussex gentleman named Gilbert, whose name and arms he assumed pursuant to royal sign manual in 1677. Blessed with large wealth, Mr. Davies Gilbert did not content himself with aiding the advance of science by his own most indefatigable exertions, but took every opportunity of bringing forth talent from obscurity, and of affording its possessor those advantages which his own poverty might otherwise have denied him, to the utter destruction of his hopes and prevention of his usefulness. He it was, to whom the great Sir Humphrey Davy mainly owed it, that his great talents were not lost to himself and society in the obscurity of a Cornish apothecary's shop; and several less distinguished, but able and useful, men were equally indebted to him. He contributed several papers to the transactions of scientific societies, and published "A Plain Statement of the Bolution Question," but he seems to have been far less ambitious of bringing his own abilities before the public, than of indirectly exerting them for the public good. His whole character is so well stated by his biographer, that we borrow the very words of his summing up:—"The Roman simplicity which marked his demeanour was, in itself, a perpetual letter of recommendation to the intelligent observer of mankind, and the sense of that was heightened by farther intercourse, which developed his English and gentlemanlike courtesy, his kind and affable attention, and his various and profound attainments. It was, indeed, delightful to contemplate such qualities reposing so quietly within the calm mind of their possessor; like the treasure-mines of his native country, without a sign upon the surface to tell where their exhaustless wealth existed. And he must have been able to dig deep who could have explored the stores of knowledge in all the exact sciences which was there to be found; for Mr. Gilbert was acknowledged to be at the very head of those whose application to the more abstruse branches of learning have been crowned with the greatest success. He communicated largely to the wants of others from his own great stores of knowledge, and shone more by those reflected lights than by the direct diffusion of his rays. He represented the borough of Bodmin in parliament, from 1806 to 1822. Born, 1767; died, 1840.

GLYN, Sir RICHARD CARR, bart., an eminent London banker, and an alderman from the year 1790, till he resigned his gown in 1835. He was born in 1755; served the office of sheriff in 1790; was lord-mayor in 1799; became father of the corporation on the death of Sir W. Curtis in 1829; and died in April, 1832, aged 83.

ber of the British parliament, where his efforts in favour of the abolition of slavery, and the opposition generally manifested by him to the proceedings of the Bank of England, rendered him a prominent character. He was also governor of the Royal Exchange Assurance Company. Born, 1762; died, 1838.

GREGORY, OLINTHUS, LL.D. was born at Yaxley, in Huntingdonshire, in 1774. He commenced his literary career at the age of nineteen, by publishing "Lessons, Astronomical and Philosophical, for the Amusement and Instruction of British Youth;" but the works which chiefly brought him into notice were his "Treatise on Astronomy," and the "Pantologia," a comprehensive dictionary of the arts and sciences, of which he undertook the general editorship. Through the interest of his friend Dr. Hutton, he was appointed, in 1802, mathematical master at the royal military academy, Woolwich; in which establishment he eventually obtained the Professor's chair, filling it with reputation until he was obliged through ill-health, brought on by intense study, to resign it in 1838. Besides the works above mentioned, and many others, Dr. Gregory was the author of "Elements of Plane and Spherical Trigonometry," "Mathematics for Practical Men," "Letters to a Friend, on the Evidences, Doctrines, and Duties of the Christian Religion," 2 vols, and "Memoirs of the Life, Writings, &c. of the late John Mason Good, M.P." His original papers and editorial labours, also, on different branches of art and science were numerous; and from the year 1817 he had the whole of the general superintendence of the almanacks published by the stationers' company. Died, 1841.

GUSTAVUS IV. ex-king of Sweden, was born in 1778, and ascended the throne when his father fell by the hand of an assassin, March 29, 1792. During his minority the administration of affairs was committed to the duke of Sudermania, as regent; and on becoming of age, the young king went to Russia, to receive the hand of Catharine Paulowna, daughter of the empress, but on its being required that his bride should be allowed to profess the religion of the Greek church, he abruptly put an end to the negotiations, and returned to Sweden. He soon after wedded a princess of Baden, and was at that place when the duke of Enghien was there so unjustifiably seized, and after a mock trial, shot, by the orders of Napoleon. From that moment Gustavus resolved upon an eternal hostility to the French emperor. He ordered his ambassador to leave Paris, and dismissed the French ambassador from Sweden, while at the same time he returned to the king of Prussia the order of the black eagle, with which Napoleon had been invested, saying "that he never could, according to the laws of knighthood, consent to be brother companion of the assassin of the duke of Enghien." After this he continued to join every party opposed to, and to wage war with every party in alliance with, the emperor. His hostile proceedings, however, became at last so pregnant with danger to his country, that the council of state entreated him to make peace. This he refused to do, and a revolution in Sweden was the consequence. He and his family were, in 1809, conveyed to the fortress of Drottningholm, and afterwards to Gripsholm, where he signed his abdication; his uncle, the duke of Sudermania, was then raised to the throne, by the title of Charles XIII., and Christian Augustus, of Holstein Augustenburg, was invested with the title of prince royal of Sweden, or heir apparent. This prince dying soon after, the succession was transferred to marshal Bernadotte, who in 1818 ascended the Swedish throne, as Charles John XIV. After his abdication and imprisonment, Gustavus was for years known as a mere wanderer upon the face of Europe, sometimes bearing the designation of count Gottorp, sometimes that of the duke of Holstein, and again the more humble one of Gustavson. He was in England, at Hartwell, with Louis XVIII. His latter years were spent in poverty; his small annuity being less than 100*l*. From his relations and friends he would receive nothing; and his son, prince Gustavus Vasa, a general in the Austrian service, naturally anxious to render his father's condition less miserable, was compelled to adopt various devices to assist him. This unfortunate monarch died in February, 1837.

HALKETT, Sir PETER, bart., was second son of the fourth baronet of that name. He entered the naval service of his country at an early age, and at the beginning of the French war in 1793, served as lieutenant on board the Syren frigate, in which H.R.H. the duke of York took his passage to Holland for the purpose of assuming the command of the British troops sent there to co-operate with the Dutch forces in repelling the French. The garrison of Williamstadt was at that time very closely besieged by the French, and lieutenant Halkett displayed so much zeal, daring, and ability, that H.R.H. the duke of York honoured him with his especial notice and commendation, recommended him almost immediately for promotion to the rank of commander, and not very long afterwards to that of post captain. He was also honoured with a medal of the value of 500 guilders, bearing a highly complimentary inscription, which was presented to him by the prince of Orange. Soon after captain Halkett was posted, which was in August, 1794, he obtained the command of the Circe, of 28 guns, stationed in the North Sea. Of his qualities as an officer, some notion may be formed from the fact, that in the alarming mutinies which marked the year 1797, the Circe's crew took no part, a fact which obtained captain Halkett the public thanks of the lords of the admiralty and the freedom of the city of Hull. Captain Halkett passed from the Circe to the Apollo, with which he convoyed the outward-bound West India fleet, and afterwards cruised on the Jamaica station for nearly three years, making many valuable prizes. He was subsequently appointed to the Ganges, 74; in 1812 he obtained the rank of rear-admiral; in 1821 that of vice-admiral, and in 1837, that of admiral. In the last-named year, too, being then in command of the North American station, he succeeded to the baronetcy on the death of his brother. Born, 1766; died, 1840.

HALLIDAY, Sir Andrew, an eminent physician, K.H., M.D., and F.R.S. of Edinburgh and Göttingen. He was originally educated for the church, but, being of an ardent and active disposition, he prevailed on his friends to allow him to embrace a more active pursuit. After going through the usual routine of education, in addition to a diligent attention to those studies more especially connected with the profession of medicine, Mr. Halliday travelled throughout Russia, Hungary, and Poland; and on his return to England commenced practice at Birmingham, where he met with very considerable success. His active nature, however, soon induced him to obtain a medical appointment on the staff of the army, and he served with great credit to himself, and no less advantage to the troops in Spain and Portugal. He was present at the memorable assault upon Bergen-op-Zoom, and at the still more memorable battle of Waterloo. His great professional talents, his stock of general knowledge, and his amiable and prepossessing manners, gained him an enviable distinction, both abroad and at home, to which circumstance he doubtless partly owed the honour of being selected to fill the post of travelling medical attendant to William IV., when that sovereign, then duke of Clarence, was obliged to travel for the restoration of his health. On the paternal side he could boast of being descended from the sister of the great Sir William Wallace, and he inherited all the love of country which distinguished the Scottish warrior. Much as he mixed in the more active scenes of life, he found time to produce several publications, all of them above mediocrity, and some of high merit. The principal of his works are a "Memoir on the West Indies;" "Observations on Ephemera, or the disease which arises from the diffusion of air into the cavity of the throat;" "Remarks on the Lunatic Asylums in Ireland;" "Observations on the State of the Portuguese army, 1811;" a translation of Professor Frank's "Exposition of the Causes of Diseases;" "Memoir of the Campaign of 1815;" a "History of the House of Brunswick and Lunenburg;" and "Annals of the House of Hanover;" and, in addition to these he was, at the time of his death, busied in preparing for the press a History of the principal campaigns of the duke of Wellington, for which he had collected an abundance of materials. Died, 1840.

HARDY, Vice-admiral Sir Thomas, G.C.B., a gallant officer, of whom, for his own fame's sake, it might suffice to say that he was the friend and brother-in-arms of the gallant Nelson, whose last breath he received on board the Victory; but the life of such a man is too important as an example to be so lightly passed over. At the early age of twelve he entered the royal navy as a midshipman on board the Helena, of fourteen guns, and in November, 1793, was made lieutenant in the Melanger, of the squadron of Nelson, under whose notice he was thus brought. He was thenceforth constantly employed under that hero, who, in 1797, promoted him to the command of the brig La Mutine, of the capture of which he was the main cause. His constant gallantry, and especially his conduct at the battle of the Nile, in which his vessel, La Mutine, was the only single decker that was present, caused Nelson to promote him to the command of the Vanguard. In July, 1803, he became flag-captain to Nelson, on board the Victory, and he it was who, on the fatal though glorious 21st of October, 1805, received the last orders of the greatest naval chief the world has ever seen. For his services at Trafalgar he was created a baronet. After six and thirty years of arduous and efficient service in every quarter of the globe, he was, in 1834, appointed to the lucrative and honourable post of governor of Greenwich Hospital, where he constantly resided till the close of his valuable life. Born, 1769; died, 1839.

HARRISON, William Henry, president of the United States of America, was born in Virginia, in 1773; his father being one of the most conspicuous among the patriots of the revolution. After receiving the customary education at Hampden Sydney college, he studied for the medical profession; but participating in the general excitement which prevailed throughout the country against the barbarous mode of warfare at that time practised by the Indians on the north-western frontiers, he suddenly abandoned the precepts of Galen, and joined his brethren in arms, as an ensign in the U. S. artillery. This was in 1791, when he was but eighteen, and he continued in the army till 1797, when his career of civil services began. His first appointment was that of secretary and ex-officio lieutenant-governor of the north-western territory; he was subsequently appointed governor of Indiana Territory; while both as an officer of the government, and as an able representative in congress, he displayed the principles of a disinterested patriot. During the years 1811, 1813, and 1815, general Harrison assembled a body of militia and volunteers, and marched against the Indians, who, under Tecumseh, had created serious disturbances on the frontier; and the result proved how eminently fitted he was for conducting the operations of war against a savage foe. The most signal success crowned his efforts; and he was appointed by Mr. Madison to negotiate with those enemies against whom his military skill had been so ably directed. In 1824 he was sent as United States minister to Columbia; and in 1840 he received the highest honour that can be bestowed upon a citizen of a free country, in being elected to preside over it as its chief magistrate. But just as his measures were coming into operation, and when at the height of his popularity, he was seized with an illness, and died April 4, 1841; being the first American president whose death has occurred while in office.

HIBBERT, George, an eminent merchant and citizen of London, alike distinguished for his talents and public spirit, was born in Manchester, in 1747. Being destined from his youth to a commercial life, he was introduced into a leading mercantile house in the city, engaged in the West India trade; in which, first as a junior partner, and eventually as head of the firm, he continued nearly half a century. Possessing strong common sense, a retentive memory, and a mind richly stored with various information, together with the faculty of expressing himself in a public assembly with clearness and fluency, he became a valuable adviser and coadjutor on all commercial questions; he was accordingly selected to move the resolutions of the merchants, bankers, and traders, which led to the imposition of the property-tax in 1798, when the exigencies of the nation required the sacrifice; and again to move those resolutions which forced its repeal in 1806. In 1806 he was elected M.P. for Seaford, and sat for that borough till 1812. He was greatly instrumental in originating and maturing that noble undertaking, the West India Docks; "in grateful testimony" of which, in 1804, he was presented by the company with some splendid ornamental plate. Mr. Hibbert was elected F.R.S. in 1810; he was also F.S.A., and a member of the Roxburgh club. Botany likewise engaged his attention, and served as an employment for him in his retirement from the active duties of commercial life. He employed agents in almost every part of the globe to send him whatever was rare and curious; and he was the means of introducing into this country many new and beautiful species of plants. The collection thus formed, at his residence at Clapham, was commenced forty years before his death; and to the empress Josephine it was frequently indebted. Having, in 1829, succeeded to the estate of the late Rogers Parker, esq., of Munden, in Hertfordshire, (his wife's uncle) he quitted mercantile pursuits; and in his retirement enjoyed the intimate friendship of many distinguished public characters. He died, Oct. 6, 1837.

HICKS, JOHN, a gallant British officer, late colonel of the 32nd foot, which regiment he entered as an ensign in 1798. In the early part of his career he served at Gibraltar and the West Indies; and when in 1811 he received the brevet of lieutenant-colonel, he sailed with the regiment for the Peninsula. He was present at Ciudad Rodrigo, Salamanca, Burgos, Pampeluna, and at the battles of the Pyrenees, Nivelle, Nive, and Orthes. He also commanded his regiment at the battles of Quatre Bras and Waterloo, in both of which it was actively engaged from the commencement to the end, and on these days his horse was five times wounded under him; several balls also passed through his coat, and one grazed his forehead. On the advance of the army to Paris he was appointed by the duke of Wellington one of the commandants of the city; and he received various crosses and other honourable tokens for his services. Died, at Malvern, April, 1838.

HILL, Sir GEORGE FITZGERALD, bart., was educated for the legal profession, but the turbulent politics of the times during the French Revolution, and the effect of those politics upon the public mind in Ireland, led him to devote himself to the task of upholding the constitution. He was returned as member of parliament for Coleraine in 1791, and sat for that borough until the death of his father, Sir Hugh Hill, in 1798; when he was unanimously elected as member for the city of Londonderry, which his father had represented for upwards of a quarter of a century. Before the meeting of parliament, however, he accepted the valuable and important office of clerk of the Irish House of Commons—which acceptance of course vacated his seat. In 1802 he was again chosen to represent Londonderry, and he continued to do so until the year 1830, when he was appointed Governor of the island of St. Vincent; from which, in 1833, he was removed to fill the same important post in the island of Trinidad. During the stormy and perilous times of the Irish rebellion, Sir George held the important offices of colonel of the Londonderry militia, recorder of Derry, and captain commandant of the Londonderry yeomanry. Holding such offices in a country so torn and agitated as Ireland then was, it is difficult to say whether firmness towards the bold and bad, or consideration towards the merely deluded and ignorant, and their innocent but no less suffering connections, were the most required. Fortunately for those who moved within the very extended sphere of his influence, Sir George Hill united firmness, where it was needed, to mercy, where it was practicable, to an extent that enabled him to command the admiration of his political opponents, even while most signalizing himself in upholding the institutions of his country, and vindicating the rights and honor of his sovereign. Aided by his brother, Mr. Rowley Hill, he formed a battalion, cavalry and infantry, 500 strong, which was of the most important service in putting a stop to the insane proceedings of the misguided men who were urged into rebellion by the incendiary speeches and writings of the demagogues of the day. Born, 1763; died, 1839.

HILTON, WILLIAM, R.A., an eminent English artist. His forte was the picturesque ideal, and it is difficult to say whether he was most excellent as a designer, or as a colourist. His pictures are very numerous, and if they have not been made what is called "popular," by means of engravings from them, it is because their chastity of design and their exquisite finish make them essentially and exclusively appeal only to the genuine cognoscenti. His "Rape of Ganymede," "Hebe," and "Rape of Proserpine," are exquisite, especially the first-named, which was his presentation piece when he was elected R.A., in 1820. On the death of the great, though eccentric Fuseli, Mr. Hilton succeeded him as keeper of the Royal Academy, and in that important office he so ably and indefatigably directed and aided the students, that just before his death they presented him with a valuable piece of plate. Born, 1787; died, 1840.

HOARE, Sir RICHARD COLT, bart., F.R.S. and F.S.A., an eminent local historian and topographer, was the eldest son of Sir Richard Hoare, the first baronet, and born in 1758. In 1783 he married the eldest daughter of lord Lyttleton; but his lady died in 1785, leaving one son, the late Henry Hoare, esq., and in order to alleviate his grief for her loss he made a tour through Italy, France, and Switzerland; which countries he again visited in 1788, and during the two following years he travelled over the greater part of the continent. It was not, however, till the year 1818 that he was induced to print, for private circulation among his friends, his "Recollections" of that interesting "Classical Tour," in 4 vols. Various treatises on antiquarian and other kindred subjects occasionally came from his pen; but his great work, on which he bestowed the utmost care and attention, and which entitles him to a distinguished place in the first rank of topographical historians, is the "Ancient and Modern History of Wiltshire," which at the time of his death was not quite complete. Sir Richard was also the patron of others engaged in liberal pursuits, and his memory will long be held in respect by an extensive circle who knew how to appreciate his amiable qualities. He died, aged 79, May 19, 1838.

HOLFORD, ROBERT, F.R.S., a gentleman whose character for benevolence, patronage of the arts, and literary attainments, entitle him to our notice, was descended from an ancient and respectable family at Weston Birt, in Gloucestershire, and educated at Westminster-school, and St. John's college, Cambridge. Although zealously attached to his country and her valued institutions, and numbering among his most intimate friends, Mr. Wilberforce and other statesmen, he never entered the arena of public contention. In early life he had traversed on foot the lofty mountains and beautiful valleys of Switzerland; and in later years much of his time was spent in excursions on board his yachts—a recreation in which he took great delight. He died, aged 80, at his marine villa in the Isle of Wight, Aug., 1838.

HOLLAND, HENRY RICHARD VASSALL, lord, was the only son of Stephen second lord Holland, elder brother of the right hon. Charles James Fox. His father and mother dying while the subject of this memoir was in his infancy, the care of the child devolved on his uncle the earl of Upper Ossory, who placed him at Eton, where he remained about eight years, and then entered as a nobleman at Christchurch, Oxford. On quitting the university, he visited Denmark, France, and Switzerland; and was present when Louis XVI. accepted the constitution, after his attempt to leave the country, and seizure at Varennes. He subsequently travelled through Spain and Italy; and while in the latter country he formed an intimacy with the wife of Sir Godfrey Webster, bart.; in consequence of which the latter brought an action against him, and obtained 6000*l.* damages. Lady Webster being subsequently divorced, lord Holland married her in 1797, and on that occasion took, by royal sign manual, the surname of Vassall. During his parliamentary career he was the uncompromising advocate of the Catholic claims; a zealous promoter of every endeavour to soften the asperities of the law; and an assertor of popular rights in the most extensive sense of the term. When the Whig party came into power in 1830, his lordship became a cabinet minister, and chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. His lordship's character has been thus summed up by one of his political adherents and personal admirers: "None ever enjoyed life more than lord Holland, or enjoyed it more intellectually; and none ever was more contributory to the enjoyment of others. He possessed the sunshine of the breast, and no one could approach him without feeling its genial influence. Lord Holland was a wit without a particle of ill-nature, and a man of learning without a taint of pedantry." There are not a few, however, who condemn the ultra-liberal policy by which his lordship was guided, and are yet not disposed to withhold from him the praise of being an urbane gentleman, an accomplished scholar, and a friend of merit wherever it could be found. He died Oct. 22, 1840.

HOOK, THEODORE EDWARD, F.S.A. a celebrated novelist and dramatic writer, but more celebrated for his surpassing wit and extemporaneous powers, was the youngest son of James Hook, the popular composer, and brother of the Rev. James Hook, dean of Worcester, (brief notices of whose lives are inserted in the body of this work). He was born in London, in 1746, and received his education at Harrow. Scidom are the indications of genius in youth so apparent and so mature as they were in the case of Theodore Hook. At 17 he produced his first drama, "The Soldiers Return," which was speedily followed by "Catch him who can," "Teekeh," "Killing no Murder," and nine other dramatic pieces, nearly all of which were decidedly successful. These, with a host of piquant articles in the "Satirist" magazine, and other periodicals, were hit off before he reached his 25th year. His reputation as a man of rare accomplishments, elegant manners, and pre-eminent convivial talents being fully appreciated, he was a welcome guest wherever gaiety, wit, and good-humour were in request; and his intimacy with many distinguished characters was the result of it. In October, 1813, he was appointed to the office of accountant-general and treasurer of the Mauritius, which he held till February, 1818, when it was discovered that there was a deficiency in the military chest of about 12,000*l.* abstracted, as it afterwards appeared, by his deputy, (who, on the accounts being about to be investigated, destroyed himself); but Mr. Hook, as a matter of course, was made answerable for the acts of his subordinate. He was accordingly sent home; his effects were seized and sold; and he became for a considerable time an inmate of the King's Bench. His literary labours were both his solace and support; his industry kept pace with his increasing popularity; and to his fame as a dramatist was now to be added his success as a novelist. The first series of "Sayings and Doings" appeared in 1824; and so well was it received, that Mr. Colburn presented him with 350*l.* more than the price agreed upon; and a second and a third series soon followed, for each of which the same publisher gave him 1000 guineas. Other novels, as "Jack Braz," "Births, Deaths, and Marriages," "Gilbert Gurney," &c. &c. followed at short intervals: he also wrote "Memoirs of Sir David Baird," and of "Michael Kelly," the composer. But not a little of his notoriety arose from his connexion with the "John Bull," it being pretty generally understood that he was the editor as well as a joint proprietor, and that most of those bold political articles, racy sketches of men and manners, smart poems, and epigrammatic jeux d'esprit, which for so long a time gave that ultra Tory paper its prominent and peculiar features, owed their existence to him. For the last few years he was the editor of the New Monthly Magazine. Died, Aug. 24, 1841.

HUMANN, M., French minister of finance, was a native of Alsace, which, at the time of his birth, was accounted a province of the empire. He commenced his active life as the master of a mercantile depot in Paris; where, by a variety of circumstances, he was enabled to bring himself into notice as an able financier, and by that means finally to gain a seat in the cabinet in this capacity, in 1832. He was out of office, however, from 1836 to 1840, when he came in with the new administration; and it appears that he was minister of finance in seven cabinets out of the nineteen which were formed and dissolved between 1830 and the time of his death, which occurred in April, 1842.

HUMMEL, JOHN NEPOMUK, an eminent musician, was born at Preburg, in 1778. His friends discovering in him an extraordinary capacity for music, he was placed with Mozart when only seven years of age; and after remaining under his roof about two years, he and his father travelled through various parts of Europe, visiting England in 1791, where his performances on the piano-forte were highly applauded. He soon acquired great celebrity as a composer as well as a performer. In 1820 he became chapel-master to the duke of Weimar, where he continued afterwards to reside, making, from time to time, brilliant and profitable tours in Germany, Russia, and England. Hummel composed some operas, the most celebrated of which is "Mathilde von Guise;" his church music was also admirable; but his fame will chiefly rest upon his brilliant compositions for the piano-forte. He died in October, 1837.

JAMIESON, Rev. JOHN, D.D. a theological writer and philologist, was the minister to a congregation of seceders from the Scotch church at Edinburgh. His chief works are an "Etymological Dictionary of the Scottish Language," 2 vols. 4to.; "A Vindication of the Doctrine of Scripture," 2 vols. 8vo.; "The Use of Sacred History," 2 vols. 8vo.; "An Historical Account of the Ancient Cultiva of Iona;" two poems, "The Sorrows of Slavery," and "Eternity;" besides various Sermons, &c. He died, aged 40, July, 1838.

JONES, JOHN GALE, by profession an apothecary, but far better known as a political orator, was born in 1771. At the breaking out of the French revolution he became a leading member of the celebrated London Corresponding Society; and, until a few years before his death, he was known as a popular declaimer at the various political meetings held in the metropolis. Having rendered himself obnoxious to the government by his violence, and impugned the proceedings of the House of Commons, he was committed to Newgate in February, 1810, and there remained till his liberation was effected by the prorogation of parliament, June 21, (the day on which Sir Francis Burdett by the same circumstance was released from the Tower.) The part he took in advocating republican doctrines had formerly subjected him to a trial at the Warwick assizes, when he obtained a verdict of acquittal, which was mainly attributable to the skilful advocacy of his counsel, Sir Samuel Romilly. As a public speaker he was fluent, energetic, and impressive; in private life he is said to have been an unassuming and instructive companion. Died, April, 1838.

JONES, Colonel LESLIE GROVE, was, in early life, a midshipman; but having humanely, though very insubordinately, interfered respecting the punishment of one of the seamen, he was so severely censured, that he quitted the navy in disgust, and, shortly afterwards, was presented with an ensign's commission in the first foot guards. He served throughout the Peninsular war, and was, as is reported, a rather favourite aide-de-camp of the duke of Wellington, whose high opinion of his zeal, discretion, and gallantry, may be formed from the fact that, previous to the battle of Waterloo, the honourable and responsible office of commandant of Brussels was entrusted to him. Being put on half-pay at the peace, he engaged in literary composition, and occasionally produced some essays, &c. But it was not till the great struggle for the Reform Bill that he appeared before the world as a political writer. It unfortunately happens that, to mean well and to judge well, are not always the same thing; and colonel Jones's political letters, which appeared in the "Times," had all the violence of those of Junius, without their redeeming vigour, sarcasm, and eloquence. Born, 1779; died, 1839.

JOY, Right Hon. HENRY, an able Irish judge, was called to the bar in 1788, and after enjoying high reputation as a counsel, filled the office of attorney-general, and in 1821 succeeded lord Guillemore as chief baron. Among the "sayings" of Lord Norbury, the following is related: being once requested by Mr. Hope, the attorney, to wait a few minutes for Mr. Joy, his leading counsel in a visi prius case just then called on, his lordship did so until his small stock of patience was exhausted; then exclaiming, "Hope told a flattering tale, that Joy would soon return," ordered the next case in rotation to be proceeded with. Born, 1767; died, 1838.

KINGSBOROUGH, EDWARD, viscount, eldest son of the third earl of Kingston, was greatly distinguished for his literary acquirements and his attachment to literary pursuits. His lordship was a fellow of the Antiquarian Society, and author of a splendid work on "The Antiquities of Mexico." Born, 1793; died, 1837.

KINGSTON, GEORGE KINO, third earl of. He succeeded his father in the Irish peerage, in 1797, and, as a known supporter of the union, was elected an Irish representative peer immediately after that event. His lordship, in 1794, married lady Helena Moore, only daughter of the earl of Mountcashel, by whom he had seven children. He was created a peer of the united kingdom, under the title of baron Michelston, at the coronation of George IV. His lordship's politics tended to conservatism, but he took no very considerable part in public business. Born, 1771; died, 1840.

KNIGHT, THOMAS ANDREW, president of the Horticultural Society of London, was born at Wormsley Grange, near Hereford, in 1758. In a biographical notice which appeared of this gentleman in the Athenæum, it is stated that the great object of his life had been "to improve the races of domesticated plants, to establish important points of cultivation upon sound physiological reasoning, and to increase the amount of food which may be procured from a given space of land;" and it is further remarked, that the extraordinary improvement which has taken place in the art of horticulture during the last twenty years, is unquestionably traceable in a more evident manner to the practice and writings of Mr. Knight than to all other causes combined. Upwards of forty years ago he began to be publicly known as a vegetable physiologist; and he pursued his studies in that branch of science with perseverance and great success through a long and useful career. He died May 11, 1838, highly esteemed by a large circle of friends and acquaintance, and regretted by the scientific world as one whose loss it is difficult to supply.

LANCASTER, JOSEPH, a member of the Society of Friends, the author and the equally persevering and successful promulgator of the system of mutual instruction, known under the title of "the Lancasterian," to which so large a majority of the poorer classes in this country owe the blessings of education. He was for many years actively engaged in delivering lectures and forming schools in various parts of England; and rank, wealth, and beauty seemed to bear the earnest though simple eloquence of the enthusiastic and benevolent quaker. But enthusiastic as were the applauses bestowed upon him, patronage and support were not bestowed in like proportion; and he to whom the poor of England owed their education, and to whom society, consequently, owed so large a share of its best security against vice and disturbance, became so much embarrassed in consequence of his benevolent exertions, that he was obliged to seek an asylum in America. There also he suffered many embarrassments, and a subscription was just proposed for his relief, when he was run over in New York, and so severely injured, that he died on the day following the accident. He was the author of several letters and lectures on

LAUDERDALE, JAMES MATTHEW, earl of Lauderdale, a very active statesman, whose opinions, both on account of his ability and of his influential position, were at one time deemed to be of great weight, both by his own party and by his opponents; though it is difficult for us, who look merely at the opinions, and are unswayed alike by the favour and by the rancour of party, to understand how a peer of the realm, holding hereditary high office, and having a large stake in the welfare of his country than most men even of his own rank, could be looked up to by wise men of any party worthy of that name, while openly, indeed violently, espousing and supporting the French jacobin party. Having received an excellent education, partly under the learned Dr. Dalzell, and partly in the universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow, he resided for some time in Paris. In 1780 he was returned to parliament for Newport, in Cornwall, and subsequently for Malmesbury. As a member of the lower house he joined the party of his friend, Mr. Fox, and took an active part in opposing the North administration, supported Mr. Fox's India Bill, and was one of the managers of the impeachment of Warren Hastings. In 1789 he succeeded to the title, and was in the following year sent to the house of lords as one of the sixteen Scottish representative peers. In 1792 the state of his health caused him to reside for some time in France, and he arrived in Paris only three days before the attack on the Tuilleries, and the imprisonment of the royal family. What he saw there, though it convinced him that France was no safe residence for a man of rank, and caused him to return home almost immediately, does not seem to have persuaded him that actions are but the result of principles, practice of theory. In 1806, on the dissolution of the Pitt administration, he was created a peer of the United Kingdom, was sworn a privy councillor, and received the great seal of Scotland. In August of the same year he was sent as minister-plenipotentiary to France, with full powers to conclude a peace. Of the termination of that negotiation this is not the place to speak, the mere fact of our subject being entrusted with the task of negotiating with such men as Buonaparte and Talleyrand, is sufficient to show the high estimation in which his judgment was then held. The short-lived "all the talents" administration being broken up in 1807, the earl of Lauderdale had to resign the great seal of Scotland to its former keeper, the duke of Gordon. He subsequently held no office, but he was, to a very late period of his life, punctual and active in his parliamentary exertions. Born, 1759; died, 1840.

LAURENCE, DR. RICHARD, archbishop of Cashel, was the son of a tradesman at Bath, and was educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford. As a theological writer and general scholar he had few equals in his day. His industry was prodigious, and no less conspicuous was his zeal for upholding not merely the rights and authority of the church, but its purity and saving influence also. His "Doctrine of the Church of England upon the Efficacy of Baptism;" and his sermon "On Singularity and Excess in Theological Literature," are extremely valuable to theological students. Born, 1761; died, 1839.

LE BRETON, SIR THOMAS, an eminent lawyer, was born in Jersey, in 1763, and having adopted the legal profession, gradually rose to its highest offices in his native island; having been attorney-general from 1802 to 1816, afterwards lieutenant-bailiff, and for the last twelve years of his life, bailiff of Jersey. Died, 1838.

LEEDS, GEORGE WILLIAM FREDERICK OSBORNE, duke of, was born in 1773, and succeeded his father in the dukedom in 1790. He was sworn a privy councillor, and appointed master of the horse in 1827, which office he resigned with the duke of Wellington's administration in 1830. He, however, never took much interest in politics; but it was his pride to support the character of "the fine old English gentleman," and to maintain a pre-eminence on the turf, where his influence and honourable conduct will be long remembered. He was a knight of the garter, lord lieutenant of the North Riding of York, governor of the island of Scilly, &c. Died, July 10, 1838.

LINDESAY, SIR PATRICK, K.C.B. This gallant officer received his commission as captain in the 70th foot in 1793; removed to the 39th in the following year, and was made major of it in 1807. He served throughout the Peninsular war, and was decorated with a medal for the battle of Albuera. In 1811 he was made lieutenant-colonel by brevet, and commanded the 39th foot for many years. During the Burmese war he was a general of division, and was promoted to the rank of major-general in 1837. He died at an advanced age in April, 1839.

LOBAU, count, marshal of France, and commandant of the National Guard of the department of the Seine. This eminent soldier, whose name was MONTON, was of a very poor and obscure family. At the breaking out of the revolution he was employed as a journeyman baker in his native town, Phalsburg in the Meurthe. But on entering the army he speedily signalized himself by acts of bravery, which were rewarded by various steps of promotion, until, in 1804, at the camp of Boulogne, Napoleon, amid the applause of the whole army, made him his aide-de-camp, and gave him the command of the third regiment of the line. In the campaign of 1805 his efficient gallantry obtained him the rank of general of brigade, and in 1807 that of general of division. In the campaign of 1809 he defended the little island of Lobau (from which he took his subsequent title) against the Austrians, completely beat them off, and took his troops, comparatively unhurt, across the Danube. In 1812 he was made aide-major of the imperial guard; in 1813, commander of the first corps of the grand army; and in 1814, a chevalier of St. Louis. During the memorable "hundred days" he gave his support to Napoleon, and was made commandant of the first military division, and a member of the chamber of peers. In the brief but busy campaign of 1815, he commanded the sixth corps of the army of the north. He gave the Prussians a severe defeat on the 6th of June in that year, but was wounded and sent prisoner to England from that burial place of his aspiring master's hopes—Waterloo. From that time until 1818, he remained in England; he was then permitted to return home, and in 1828 was sent as deputy for the Meurthe, and took his seat on the opposition benches. In the revolution of 1830 he took an active part; and when Lafayette resigned the command of the National Guard, count Lobau was appointed his successor. Shortly afterwards he received his marshal's baton from Louis Philippe, by whom he was greatly respected. Born, 1770; died, 1839.

LODGE, EDMUND, clarencieux king at arms, K.H., and F.S.A.; a biographer so eminent, that, merely to mention one of his works, is to pronounce his eulogy; we, of course, allude to his well-known and admirable "Portraits of Illustrious Personages of Great Britain," of which an able contemporary critic well observed, "It is no exaggeration to say, that they are a model of biographical composition. Though a political bias may from time to time be observable in these exquisite memoirs, they are almost unrivalled in original conceptions of character, profound knowledge of human nature, and felicity of expression, which, united to extraordinary power, terseness, and beauty of style, render the volumes an ornament to our literature, and worthy of the great personages who are there revived in their authentic and striking effigies." Mr. Lodge, who was, in early life, a cornet of dragoons, published several other works, "Illustrations of British History," "the Life of Sir Julius Caesar," &c., &c., besides some elaborate and erudite papers in the "Quarterly Review." Born, 1736; died, 1839.

LOVE, WILLIAM, a commander in the royal navy. Though holding only this comparatively humble rank in the service of his country, he well deserves to be included in the long and glorious list of England's naval heroes. In the year 1778, being then only thirteen years of age, he entered the service as a midshipman on board the Hyæna frigate, in which he cruised on the African station. In 1780 he assisted in the relief of Gibraltar, and was present at the defeat of Don Juan de Langara, and the taking of the Caraccas convoy. His father being master of the Prothée, 53, one of the vessels appointed to go to the West Indies under the command of the gallant Rodney, Mr. Love entered on board her, and in the affair of the 12th of April, 1783, both he and his father were wounded by the same shot—the latter so badly, that he had to endure the torture of two amputations close to the hip joint. After serving in many ships, and in almost every quarter of the globe, from 1794, when he obtained his lieutenancy, to 1804, he was, in the latter year, selected as secretary and aid-de-camp to admiral Berkeley, who in that year was made commander-in-chief of the sea forces, a kind of amphibious corps called into existence by the threatened invasion of England by Buonaparte. In 1806 he accompanied admiral Berkeley to the North American station as flag-lieutenant, and almost immediately on his arrival out was appointed to act as captain of the Cleopatra frigate. In 1807 his rank of commander was confirmed by the admiralty; in the same year, being then commander of the Driver, he captured a pirate on the coast of South Carolina, and in 1811, while in command of the Tysiphone sloop, cruising off the Needles, he took Le Hazard, a French privateer. Born, 1765; died, 1839.

MACAULEY, ZACHARY, F.R.S., a zealous co-operator with Mr. Wilberforce and other distinguished philanthropists in the abolition of slavery in the British colonies; to which end he had devoted his eminent talents and best energies for upwards of forty years. He was the father of T. Babington Macaulay, esq., late one of the supreme council of India. Died, May 13, 1838, aged 70.

MACLEAN, LETITIA ELIZABETH, better known as Miss Landon, or L. E. L., a celebrated English poetess. At a very early age, even before she had left school, she attracted the notice of the reading public by her spirited short poems, published in the "Literary Gazette." The reputation she thus acquired was so great, that rival publishers vied with each other in endeavouring to obtain her aid; and, at one time, the "Annals" were scarcely thought complete if they did not contain a contribution from L. E. L. The temptation thus held out to hasty composition, however profitable, must of necessity have detracted from the power of the poetess; and accordingly, we find her poems too frequently recurring to the same theme. The same sad note, however varied the images, and however skillful the poet, will in time grow wearisome; for, though it must necessarily enter into poetry, it is not, and will not be poetry itself until man's heart be all one aching void, external nature one universal blank, and the glad voices of ten thousand living things but one tone of misery and suffering. If Mrs. Maclean, however, sometimes fell into the too common error of those young writers, who think that to wail and be poetical are one and the same thing, her later writings amply atoned for it. In her novels more especially, there were a vigour and a cheerfulness as well as a depth and clearness of thought which led us to hope that, beautiful as much of her early poetry really was, we should, during many long years, have to welcome writing from her pen which would not merely far surpass them in value and beauty, but make them appear to have been the mere preparations for a loftier and more daring flight. Her shorter compositions, in the shape of contributions to the periodicals, are almost innumerable; in addition to those, she published "The Improvisatrice;" "The Troubadour;" "The Golden Violet;" "The Golden Bracelet;" and the "Vow of the Peacock," all in verse; and three prose novels, "Romance and Reality;" "Francesca Carrara;" and "Ethel Churchill." In June, 1838, she was married to George Maclean, Esq., governor of Cape Coast Castle, South Africa, and proceeded thither with him. Being much afflicted with spasms, she was in the habit of taking a powerful medicine, and her death is attributed to her having incautiously taken an overdose. Died, Oct. 15, 1839.

MAHMOUD II., sultan of Turkey, succeeded to the imperial throne in the year 1808, on the murder, by the janizaries, of his predecessor, Mustapha IV. The murder of that prince impressed Mahmoud with a painful sense of the incompatibility of his own safety with the existence of the janizaries; and one of his first acts was to put his own brother to death, to deprive that body, and the scarcely less formidable priests, from having a pretext for open rebellion. The janizaries were cut off to a man, Mahmoud himself standing within the railing of the mosque of sultan Achmet on the hippodrome, directing as well as witnessing that most frightful massacre. Daring, subtle, allowing no moral considerations to weigh against political expediency, he subdued his rebellious pachas by force or fraud, as he found most convenient. If some distant and secure fastness rendered it next to impossible to make force available, honours were heaped upon the intended victim, and it was only when he reached Constantinople, and the fatal bow-string was at his throat, that he learned that Mahmoud's smile could be as deadly as his frown. Perhaps much allowance ought to be made for the circumstances in which Mahmoud was placed during the earlier years of his reign. Bent upon the reformation of his empire, he was constantly thwarted by the open rebellion of his pachas, and as constantly labelled by the priests, who, detesting his proposed alterations, represented every misfortune that befel the people, from a paltry fire in Constantinople, to a severe defeat in Moldavia or Bessarabia, as the direct and inevitable consequence of the anger of Heaven at the sultan's spirit of innovation. "Remorseless," says a recent and able writer, "as Mahmoud has shown himself where state policy required the removal of turbulent soldiers or rebellious chieftains, I believe no single instance can be charged against him of blood being shed in the gratification of personal pumion or caprice. On the contrary, his private conduct and public administration are marked with the character of mildness." Though successful, to an extent that could scarcely have been anticipated, in bringing about internal changes in his empire, he was externally far less fortunate. His war with Russia, from 1809 to 1812, cost him Bessarabia, and no small part of Moldavia. The Grecian revolution still further diminished his empire, and still further increased the confidence of his turbulent vassal of Egypt, who, if European policy had not brought European friends to the sultan's side, would not merely have converted his pachalic into an independent monarchy, but have been in a condition to dictate farther concessions to the son of Mahmoud the Reformer. If that prince, as many think, was too hasty in his onward movement—it must at least be admitted that he was a man of extraordinary courage and intelligence; and that, if he erred in excess of zeal, he at least was zealous, not for his own personal glory or comfort, but for the glory and well-being of the people whose destinies were entrusted to him. Born, 1785; died, 1830.

MAITLAND. Rear-admiral Sir FREDERICK LEWIS, the third son of a rear-admiral, was born in 1779, and commenced his naval career at a very early age. Leaving the narration of his first exploits, we come to the period of our expedition to Egypt in 1801, when we find captain Maitland commanding the armed launches employed to cover the landing of Sir Ralph Abercrombie's army, for which he received the thanks of the naval and military commanders-in-chief. His subsequent successes while cruising in the Mediterranean as captain of the Loire, of 46 guns, brought him into general notice, and in 1813 he was appointed to the command of the Goliath, and subsequently to the Bellerophon of 74 guns, in which ship he was sent to watch that part of the French coast off Rochefort. It was there that he happily frustrated the hopes of escape which Napoleon, after the events of the battle of Waterloo, had indulged in, by refusing to grant him terms of any sort; and the fugitive at length resolved to throw himself on the generosity of "the most powerful, the most constant, and the most generous of his enemies." He accordingly surrendered unconditionally to captain Maitland, on the 18th of July. The Bellerophon arrived in nine days after Buonaparte's surrender, and from thence proceeded to Plymouth, off which port he was removed to the Northumberland on the 7th of August, having previously proposed to present captain Maitland with his portrait set with diamonds of the value of 3000 guineas: which offer was politely declined. He was afterwards appointed to the command of the Vengeur of 74 guns; subsequently attained the rank of rear-admiral; and on the 30th of December, 1830, died in the East Indies, of which station he had for several years been commander-in-chief.

MANNERS, Right Hon. THOMAS MANNERS SUTTON, lord, was a younger brother of the late archbishop of Canterbury, and formerly lord chancellor of Ireland, from which office he retired in 1827. Born, 1756; died May, 1842.

MARSHMAN, Dr. JAMES, an eminent Baptist missionary in the East Indies, was the last survivor of those zealous men who were engaged in the Serampore mission. He arrived in India in 1799, and by dint of incessant labour, he acquired a complete mastery over the Bengalee, Sanscrit, and Chinese tongues, into the latter of which he translated a considerable portion of the Scriptures. He was also the author of "A Dissertation on the Characters and Sounds of the Chinese Language;" "Clavis Sinica;" and a translation of the works of Confucius. He was born at Westbury Leigh, in Wiltshire, 1768, and died at Serampore, Dec. 1837.

MARSH, Right Rev. HERBERT, D.D., bishop of Peterborough. Eminent both as a scholar and a divine, this prelate is chiefly known as the translator of the profound and elaborate work of "Michaelis on the New Testament." For this work he was, perhaps, better qualified than any English clergyman of his day; for after finishing his classical studies at St. John's college, Cambridge, he resided for very many years at Göttingen, where he acquired an intimate acquaintance with the German language, such as even at a much later date was not possessed by, probably, half a dozen men in England, lay or clerical. On the invasion of Germany by the French, he returned to Cambridge and took his B.D. degree, and in 1807 he was elected Lady Margaret's professor of divinity. In this important situation he made a most useful change. Up to his election the lectures of the Lady Margaret's professor had always been delivered in Latin; but he delivered his in English, and as he did so from the University pulpit, all ranks, including, no doubt, very many of strong intellect, but limited education, flocked to hear him. Besides several important translations from the German, and a long list of controversial pamphlets, rendered necessary at the time of their publication by strictures that were published upon his other works, he published "A Course of Lectures, containing a description and systematic arrangement of the several branches of Divinity, with an account of the different Authors who have excelled at different periods in Theological Learning;" "A History of the Translations which have been made from the Scriptures"—a very valuable and elaborate work, filled with recondite learning; and Homæ Pelagiæ, part I.; containing an inquiry into the origin and language of the Pelasgi, or the ancient inhabitants of Greece; with a Dissertation on the Pelagic or Æolic Dialect, as represented in the various inscriptions in which it is still preserved, and an attempt to determine its genuine Pelagic pronunciation." Of all his works, numerous as they were, the most permanently and extensively valuable are his "Lectures" which, independent of a mass of learning, very precious to the theological student, contain a far more systematic arrangement of the different branches of theological study than had ever before been published. In 1806, Mr. Marsh was created D.D. by royal mandate: in 1816 he was made bishop of Llandaff; and, three years later, translated to the see of Peterborough. Eminent as were his talents, and unwearied as was his zeal as a divine, he probably owed much of his success in life to some important information on public affairs which he transmitted to the English government during his residence in Germany, and which Mr. Pitt considered to be so important, that he rewarded it with a pension. Born, 1758; died, 1830.

MASSABIAU, M. DE, librarian at Sainte-Genevieve; author of "The Slavery of the Middle Ages," and "Esprit des Institutions Politiques." Born, 1766; died, 1838.

MATURIN, Rev. HENRY, rector of Clondewadock, in the county of Donegal, was distinguished as the author of "Bertram, or the Castle of St. Aldebrand," a tragedy, which was received with high approbation. He afterwards published "Manuel," a tragedy; "Women, or Pour et Contre," a tale, 3 vols.; "Melmoth, the Wanderer," 4 vols.; "The Universe," a poem; and "Sermons." Died Jan. 1842; aged 70.

MAVOR, Rev. WILLIAM, LL.D., was a native of Aberdeenshire, and born in 1758. He came to England early in life, and, after due probationary exercise as an assistant in a school at Burford, established himself as the master of an academy at Woodstock, where he gained the favour and patronage of the duke of Marlborough, entered into holy orders, and was presented to the vicarage of Hurley, in Berkshire. But it is as a well-known author and compiler of useful books that Dr. Mavor will be chiefly remembered. Few writers can boast of works so numerous and popular; fewer still who can truly say with him, "that he never, by a single sentiment, pandered to vice, or injured the cause of virtue." Among his literary labours are a "Universal History," in 25 small volumes; a collection of "Voyages and Travels," also in 25 volumes; "The British Tourists," 6 vols.; "The Modern Traveller," 4 vols.; Histories of Greece, Rome, and England; Spelling and Class Books; Miscellanies in Prose and Verse; and many others, for the mere insertion of whose titles we cannot here afford room; but it would be an injustice to his memory not to acknowledge that their merits are in general commensurate with their repute. During a long life he was constantly engaged in the promotion of knowledge, and in the practice of his clerical duties. He held the livings of Woodstock and Hurley, and was a magistrate for Oxfordshire. Died, December 29, 1837.

M'CLEVERTY, Major-general Sir ROBERT, a gallant marine officer, who served with great credit in almost every part of the globe. He was present at the taking of the island of St. Lucie, in the West Indies, and was senior officer of the marines of the squadron at the capture of the island of Goree, in Africa, by Sir Charles Hamilton. Though his services were great, and he undoubtedly attained a high rank, his case may illustrate the almost proverbial slowness of promotion in the English marine; his lieutenant's commission bearing date in 1778—that of colonel commandant in 1826—and that of major-general in 1837: between the first and second dates we have a space of forty-eight years, and, between the first and third, of fifty-nine years. He died in 1839.

MILHOUSE, ROBERT, a weaver, whose name we have to add to the many of those, who, born in humble station, and passing through life in humble occupation, yet have proved to be gifted in no ordinary degree with the poet's power as well as with the poet's feeling. His "Vicissitude," and "Sherwood Forest," contain passages of which any poet might be proud; but they, and, indeed, all his productions, are greatly marred by a melancholy and querulous tone scarcely justifiable in any one, but least of all in the poet, whose very art should make it impossible to look forth upon the world, and exclaim "all is barren." His productions made him many generous friends, and if he was not rich, yet he escaped from the worst sufferings which too commonly attend upon the poet who has only poetry upon which to depend. Just previous to his death, he published "The Destinies of Man," a poem in two parts, which contains some splendid passages, and which gave numerous indications—though the author was then nearly fifty years of age—of a very great improvement both as to depth of thought and propriety of versification. Died, 1839.

MOORE, Lieut.-general JAMES, an old and distinguished British officer, (who long enjoyed the friendship of the duke of Kent, to whom he was a confidential equestrian for twenty-six years), entered the army at the age of sixteen, as an ensign in the 11th foot; and that regiment forming part of the garrison at Gibraltar, where Prince Edward then commanded, that intimacy began, which ceased only with his royal patron's life. Soon after the commencement of the late war, he obtained a captaincy in the 26th dragoons, and was actively engaged in the West Indies, in the capture of St. Lucie and the other French islands. After that, as major in the 23rd dragoons, he accompanied Sir Ralph Abercromby to Egypt, where he greatly distinguished himself; and being sent on a mission into the interior to procure horses for the cavalry, by his frank and conciliatory manner, his noble figure, and admirable horsemanship, he became a great favourite with the Arab chiefs. He next served with Sir John Stuart in the expedition to Sicily, was placed on the staff as assistant adjutant-general, and was severely wounded at the battle of Maida. In 1814, he received the rank of major-general, and became lieutenant-general in 1830. To the qualities of a gallant soldier, he united the manners of a polished courtier, to which his elegant personal appearance was no trifling recommendation. Having been almost constantly employed with the Mamelukes in Egypt, he had acquired a perfect knowledge of their language and habits; and when Eld Bey visited England in 1804, colonel Moore was selected by the government to attend him as his aide-de-camp. He married Miss Watson, the only child of W. Watson, esq., sergeant-at-arms to the House of Lords, upon which occasion the duke of Kent gave them one of the pavilions attached to the palace of Hampton-court, situated in the Home-park, of which his royal highness was ranger. On the death of the duke, he waited upon George IV. with the melancholy intelligence, when his majesty kindly observed, "General, you have lost a friend; you must not lose your house;" and we learn that her present majesty no sooner heard of the general's death, than she graciously intimated to his widow that the same delightful retreat would be continued to her for life. He died in his 74th year, April 24, 1838.

timant and felicitous in expression, while others possess in an eminent degree those qualities which are supposed to give a zest to bacchanalian orgies. Captain Morris died at Brockham Lodge, Dorking, in his 93rd year, July 11, 1838.

MORTON, THOMAS, an eminent and successful dramatist, was born at Durham, in 1764. Owing to the early death of his parents, he was provided for by an uncle, who placed him at a celebrated school in Soho-square, where, it has been observed, several other popular dramatists and actors received their education. He was afterwards entered as a student at Lincoln's-inn, but his taste for theatricals caused him to abandon his profession, and he soon gave proofs of his talents as a dramatic writer: it is remarkable, indeed, that nearly all his pieces still keep possession of the stage. They consist of "The Way to get Married," "Columbus," "Town and Country," "Zorinski," "A Cure for the Heart-ache," "Speed the Plough," "Secrets Worth Knowing," "The Blind Girl," "The Children in the Wood," "The School of Reform," "The School for Grown Gentlemen," "A Roland for an Oliver," and the "Invincibles." He was a man of highly respectable habits: liberal in his remarks on cotemporary dramatists and performers, and full of sprightly anecdote; his reminiscences of the stage extending as far back as the days of Henderson, and the first appearance of the Kemble family on the London boards. He died, March 28, 1838.

MUDIE, ROBERT, author of numerous works in natural history, and others of an entertaining and instructive character, was born in Forfarshire, in 1777. He is said to have been entirely indebted for whatever learning he possessed, to his own industry and native vigour of mind; yet we find that in 1802 he was appointed Gaelic professor and teacher of drawing in the Inverness academy. He subsequently filled other situations of a like nature; but at length turned his attention exclusively to authorship, and commenced his career with a novel entitled "Glenfurgus," in 3 vols. He then for a while sought employment as a reporter for the London newspapers, and in that capacity was engaged by the proprietors of the Morning Chronicle. This was in 1820; and his connection with the press being in a manner established, his literary efforts were henceforth unceasing. Independently of his contributions to periodicals, upwards of eighty volumes from his fertile pen were in rapid succession (from that time to 1840) brought before the public. Of these we can only afford room for the titles of the most prominent: "Modern Athens," a (description of Edinburgh); "Babylon the Great," (a description of London) 4 vols.; "The British Naturalist," 2 vols.; "The Feathered Tribes of the British Islands," 2 vols.; "Conversations in Moral Philosophy," 2 vols.; "The Elements of the Heavens, the Earth, the Air, the Sea," 4 vols.; "Popular Mathematics," "Man, in his Physical Structure, Intellectual Faculties," &c., 4 vols.; "The Seasons," 4 vols.; "History of Hampshire and the Channel Islands, 3 vols.; "Domesticated Animals," "Gleanings of Nature," "China and its Resources," &c. &c. So much industry and perseverance, one might fairly have expected to see rewarded by a happy independence in the decline of life. That it was not so—that the very reverse, indeed, was the fact—we lament to hear; and, apart from any morbid feeling on the subject, we are compelled to admit, that although in the common routine of mechanical or commercial pursuits, industry and perseverance are generally attended with a fortunate issue; yet, as regards the higher operations of the intellect, the rule which holds good in other cases can no longer be depended upon. Died May, 1842, aged 64.

MULLER, CARL OTTFRIED, an eminent modern scholar and historian, was born in 1797 at Brieg, in Silesia. He was a professor of archaeology in the university of Göttingen, and distinguished himself by his researches into mythologic lore, analysing it, and disentangling the allegorical parts from the historical. But his knowledge was by no means confined to that department of literature; his work on the Eumenides of Æschylus, and many others, fully prove his classic erudition. While travelling in Greece, with a view to the commencement of an elaborate work on the history of that country, he was taken ill, and died at Athens, Aug. 1, 1840.

MUNSTER, Count, a Hanoverian statesman. In 1806, Hanover being entered by the Prussians, he entered a spirited protest and retired to England, where, on account chiefly of that protest, he was so great a court favourite, that when the mental malady of George III. was past all doubt, the count was one of the commissioners appointed to protect and administer his private property. But he is chiefly known for the part he took in the Congress of Vienna, 1814, and the declaration of 1815, by which Napoleon was put out of the pale of the law. Died, 1836.

NASMYTH, ALEXANDER, a celebrated painter, whose talents gave so strong and strikingly obvious an impetus to the art in Scotland, that he is not undeservedly called the father of the Scottish school of landscape painting. His genius as a painter was, in truth, universal, for he painted history and portraits—and it is to him that we owe the only really authentic portrait of his celebrated fellow-countryman, Robert Burns. Those who patronized Nasmyth as a portrait painter were for the most part persons of rank and wealth, and his visits to various country seats afforded him excellent opportunities of giving his advice in landscape gardening; and it is to that advice, at first generally as an amateur and in mere friendship, but subsequently as a part of his profession, that the Scottish nobility and gentry owe some of the finest of their park scenery. It may likewise be added, that to his suggestions his native city, Edinburgh, owes not a few of the judicious changes made in her streets and buildings. Born, 1757; died, 1840.

cathedral, and rector of Harrietham and Woodchurch, Kent. Dr. Nott received his education at Oxford, and obtained considerable celebrity by his sermons, preached at the Bampton lecture in 1802; soon after which he obtained the situation of sub-preceptor to Her Royal Highness the Princess Charlotte of Wales. His edition of the "Poems of the Earl of Surrey and Sir Thomas Wyatt," in 2 vols. 4to. afford ample evidence of his erudition, and his literary taste was exemplified in the selection of his very extensive and choice library. During life he was noted for unostentatious charity, and among his benevolent bequests is a considerable sum for increasing the incomes of the clergymen's widows in bishop Morley's college, Winchester. Died, Oct. 1841.

OUSELY, Major-general Sir RALPH, entered the British army in 1794, as a lieutenant in the Leicester fencibles, and first saw service at the battle of Castlebar, in Ireland, in command of a detachment of his regiment against the French (Aug. 27, 1798), and again at Ballinamack, when the enemy surrendered to lord Lake. In 1809 he joined the Portuguese army, as a major, and was present during all the operations where his corps was engaged. After the fall of Badajos in April, 1812, he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, when he distinguished himself at the head of his battalion of 500 men, in gallantly storming the heights of Urdax, and defeating 3,500 French troops who were entrusted with its defence; but in this affair he was most severely wounded. Born, 1772; died, 1842.

PARK, Sir JAMES ALLAN, an eminent English lawyer, was the son of a highly respectable surgeon of Newington, Surrey, and was educated at the free grammar school at Northampton. He was called to the bar in 1784, and speedily brought himself into notice by the profound knowledge he displayed in mercantile law, and marine insurance. A work which he published on this latter subject rapidly became the complete text-book of the profession, and continues so to this day. At the bar he was an admirable speaker, and when raised to the bench in 1816, as one of the justices of the court of common pleas, he proved himself a no less admirable judge. His summing-up was accurate in the extreme; neither the perplexity of the evidence, the cunning or the obtuseness of the witnesses, nor the sophistry of counsel, could for an instant mislead him. As a man he was eminently charitable. It was his constant custom to relieve a large number of poor persons twice a-week at his country residence, and to distribute blankets and clothing among them in the winter. In addition to the legal work of which we have made mention, he published, in 1801, "An Earnest Exhortation to a Frequent Reception of the Holy Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, addressed to Young Persons, by a Layman." Died, 1839.

PIERCE, Captain THOMAS, a gallant officer of marines. He was at the taking of all our West India Islands, and in numerous sea-fights under Rodney, Hughes, Hyde Parker, and Howe. He was wounded many times; on one occasion alone, he received three wounds while engaged with a French frigate. Died, 1830.

POLWHELE, Rev. RICHARD, an antiquarian, historian, poet, and miscellaneous writer, whose works are exceedingly voluminous, was born at Truro, in 1760, where he was also educated, and where, when a boy, with the assistance of the celebrated Dr. Wolcot, then a physician in that town, he first essayed as a poet. His father was a magistrate, and a deputy-lieutenant for Cornwall; and at his death, which happened when the subject of this notice was just seventeen years of age, he had written several poetical pieces, and obtained no small degree of literary reputation. In the following year he was entered a commoner of Christchurch, Oxford; but while there, it appears that he devoted far more attention to the muses, than to the severer studies of a college life. In 1782 he was ordained; and for several years he resided at Kenton, as curate to Archdeacon Storch. It was at this place that he wrote "The English Orator," published "Translations from the Idyllia of Theocritus, Bion, and Moschus," and planned his "History of Devonshire." He afterwards removed to the small vicarage of Manaccan, in Cornwall, presented to him by the bishop of Exeter, and there in domestic retirement he remained till the year 1806, when he undertook the curacy of Kenwan, a populous parish in the vale of Truro. In 1821 he obtained the vicarage of St. Newlyn, where he resided till 1824, when he finally removed to his paternal seat at Polwhele, near Truro. He was indefatigable and persevering as a writer; indeed, the multiplicity of his works defy our limits to enumerate them. We may, however, name the principal: "The History of Cornwall," 7 vols., 4to.; "The History of Devonshire," 3 vols.; "Traditions and Recollections," 2 vols.; "The Rural Rector," 3 vols.; "Biographical Sketches in Cornwall," 3 vols.; "Anecdotes of Methodism," "Illustrations of Scriptural Characters;" several volumes of Sermons; with numerous poems, and other writings of a miscellaneous character. In the relations of domestic life, and in the discharge of his duties as a clergyman and a magistrate, he was exemplary. He died at Truro, aged 78, March, 1838.

PORTER, Sir ROBERT KER, born at Durham, in 1780—a gentleman alike distinguished in the arts, in diplomacy, in war, and in literature—was the son of a military officer, and brother to the well-known novelists, Jane and Anna Maria Porter. Having a taste for drawing he became a student of the royal academy, and soon showed his skill by the production of several altar-pieces of considerable merit, besides his large pictures of the "Storming of Seringapatam," the "Siege of Acre," and the "Battle of Azincourt," which latter was presented to the city of London. In 1804 he was appointed historical painter to the emperor of Russia, and during his stay at St. Petersburg he gained the affections of the princess Mary, daughter of prince Theodore von Scherbatoff, to whom he was afterwards married. Though he had cultivated his talents as an artist, he had always shewn a decided preference for the military profession, and on leaving Russia he accompanied Sir John Moore to Spain, in the hardships and perils of which unfortunate expedition he shared till its final embarkation at Corunna. From 1817 to 1830 Sir Robert was engaged in travelling throughout the East. In 1836 he was appointed consul at Venezuela, in South America, where he continued to reside till 1841, when he left his mission on leave of absence, and visited his old friends in Russia, with an intention of proceeding thence to England: but as he was on the eve of preparing for the voyage, he was seized with an apoplectic attack, and expired May 3, 1842. His honorary distinctions were as follow: in 1807 he was created a knight of St. Joachim of Wurtenburg; in 1813 he received the honour of knighthood from the prince regent; in 1819 he was created a knight of the Lion and Sun of Persia; and in 1832 he was made a knight commander of the Hanoverian order. His works consist of "Travelling Sketches in Russia and Sweden," 2 vols. 4to; "Letters from Portugal and Spain;" "A Narrative of the late Campaign in Russia;" "Travels in Georgia, Persia, Armenia," &c. &c.

POZZO DI BORGO, CHARLES ANDREAS, count, an eminent diplomatist, was born in the island of Corsica, in 1768, and belonged to an ancient and honourable family which for ages had ranked high among the Corsican nobility. At the commencement of the French revolution the island was divided into two parties; the families of foreign extraction adopting the republican principles of France, while the natives of the soil demanded the restoration of ancient Corsica. On the former side was the Buonaparte family; on this side stood the youthful Pozzo di Borgo, who under the guidance of the veteran Paoli led on the patriots. They were at length denounced by the French party, and summoned to justify themselves at the bar of the French convention; but to this they replied by assembling their countrymen, and 1200 bold mountaineers vested the government of Corsica in their hands. At length the island was placed under the supremacy of Great Britain; Pozzo di Borgo was elected president of the state council, and the entire administration of the country was reorganized by him. It soon, however, became evident that Corsica must yield to France; the count therefore sought refuge first at Naples and Elba, and afterwards in England, where he was received with every mark of respect due to his high abilities and firm fidelity. He was subsequently employed in some secret diplomatic missions, in the execution of which he displayed the greatest zeal and ability; but his labours were ultimately defeated by the successes of Buonaparte. After the peace of Amiens Pozzo di Borgo entered into the diplomatic service of Russia, and represented his royal master at Vienna, whither he was sent in order to consolidate a new coalition against France. Thence he repaired to Italy, where the combined military operations of England, Russia, and Naples were about to commence. After the battle of Austerlitz, and the secession of Austria from the league, he again went to Vienna, and thence to Peter-burg. When Prussia joined the coalition, Pozzo di Borgo was created a count, and attached to the staff of the emperor as a colonel; but after the battle of Jena he was again employed at the Austrian court in the vain attempt to rouse it from its political lethargy. His next mission was to the Dardanelles, for the purpose of co-operating with the British ambassador in treating with Turkey; and in the engagement between the Russian and Turkish fleets he greatly distinguished himself. When the hollow peace of Tilsit brought about a kind of intimacy between Napoleon and the young czar, Pozzo di Borgo saw the impending danger, and requested permission to retire. "My presence," said he to the emperor, "can only tend to injure your majesty's service. Buonaparte is not the man to forget early antipathies, and sooner or later he will seize some opportunity to demand possession of my person." "Free your arms," was his parting advice, "from your present entanglement, that you may be at liberty for your final, and, I trust, successful struggle with France." He then retired to Vienna; and from that time till after the treaty of peace had been signed between Austria and France, this able statesman so energetically employed his diplomatic skill, that Napoleon did actually demand that his persevering enemy should be delivered up to him; but the demand was refused, and in the following year (1810) Pozzo once more came to England. His thorough experience was here appreciated, and understood; and to him may much of that energy which subsequently appeared in the councils of Britain be traced. He knew the most vulnerable part in Napoleon's overgrown power, and to that he directed the particular attention of the marquis of Wellesley. In 1812 the war between France and Russia broke out anew with exterminating fury; and when the mighty army of the French emperor perished on the whitened plains of Russia, Alexander thought that enough of victory had been achieved. Not so, however, thought the great diplomatist; he felt convinced that the safety of Europe was only to be found in the complete destruction of the fallen colossus, and he exerted all his energies to the accomplishment of an event so desirable. At length Sweden and Austria appeared in arms: Pozzo was made a general in the Russian service, and joined Bernadotte, who was then covering Berlin. The defence of Dresden and the battle of Leipzig soon followed; the allied forces moved slowly and warily towards France, while the moral, physical, and political condition of that country was still considered before they hazarded the decisive blow. In January, 1814, Pozzo di Borgo was despatched to London on the part of the allied monarchs; his mission succeeded, and lord Castlereagh returned with him to the head-quarters of the allies at Baden. The moderation and irresolution of the emperor Alexander often put the plans of his minister in extreme peril; but his advice eventually prevailed; the allied armies marched en masse on Paris; the abdication of the French emperor followed; and when Pozzo di Borgo had at length obtained the promise of Alexander that no negotiation should be entered into either with Napoleon or his family, he hastened to Talleyrand, exclaiming in the fulness of his joy, "Not only have I slain Napoleon politically, but I have just thrown the last shovel-full of earth over the Imperial corpse!" But his labours were not yet at an end. He proceeded to London to announce to Louis his accession to the throne of his ancestors; after which he was summoned to the congress of Vienna, where, with a degree of precedence resulting from his thorough knowledge of the man, he vehemently pressed the removal of Napoleon from Elba to some more remote and obscure corner of the globe. And when the news arrived that the ex-emperor had disembarked on the French coast, he coolly observed to the assembled statesmen, "I know Buonaparte—he will march on Paris: our work is before us; not a moment must he lost." Pozzo di Borgo immediately joined the Anglo-Prussian army, forming the vanguard of the allies in Belgium; and, though wounded, he followed Wellington to Paris, and resumed his portfolio as Russian ambassador. When the memorable "ordinances" appeared in Paris on the 26th of July, 1830, all the diplomatists were thrown into the wildest confusion, and they assembled at his hotel to determine what was their wisest course; and it was at his suggestion that they resolved to await the issue of the struggle, without taking any public official step. During the latter years of his life Pozzo di Borgo was scarcely less employed than when he was in the prime of manhood. But we have already entered sufficiently upon his various public acts; and shall conclude by observing that his last political mission was as ambassador to England. Here he remained upwards of two years; till ill health induced him to return to Paris, where he died on the 17th of February, 1842, aged 73.

PRATT, Lieut.-gen. Sir CHARLES, K.C.B., a gallant and distinguished officer, who served throughout the Peninsular war, and was present at the battles of Salamanca, Vittoria, Nivelles, Orthes, and Toulouse. Born, 1771; died, 1839.

PRITZLER, Lieut.-general Sir THEOPHILUS, K.C.B., entered the army as an ensign in 1793, was promoted to a lieutenancy in the following year, and in 1795 removed to the 5th dragoons. He served under Lord Mulgrave at Walcheren, in 1794, and in the campaigns in Holland and Germany in 1794-5. In 1796 he removed to the 21st dragoons, and served with them in St. Domingo until 1798. From that time, during many years, he held important staff appointments in England; and subsequent to the general peace in Europe, he commanded several strong divisions of the Madras army. He died very suddenly at Boulogne-sur-Mer, in April, 1839.

PRONY, GASPARD-CLAIR-FRANÇOIS-MARIE-RICHÉ DE, baron de Prony, a distinguished French mathematician. He was the pupil, and, subsequently, the assistant of Perronet, and was much employed by Napoleon, though the latter was deeply offended by Prony's refusal to accompany him to Egypt. Independent of his various missions as an engineer, and of his labours as a professor at the Polytechnic school, M. Prony was author of between thirty and forty volumes, chiefly of most laborious and extensive calculations. One work, forming 17 volumes in folio, and which still remains in MS., was executed in obedience to an order of the French government for "tables which should be as exact as possible, and, at the same time, the greatest and most imposing monument of calculation that had ever been executed, or even thought of." The result is thus stated in a biographical sketch of the baron:—"In less than two years M. de Prony had finished tables containing 10,000 sines in natural numbers to 35 places of decimals, with seven or eight columns of differences; 2,000 logarithms of sines and tangents calculated to 14 places of decimals, with four columns of differences; 10,000 logarithms relative to the proportions of sines and tangents to arcs, with three columns of differences, for facilitating interpolation in calculations relative to small angles; the logarithms of the first 10,000 numbers calculated to 19 places of decimals, and the logarithms of numbers from 10,000 to 200,000, calculated to 14 places of decimals, with five columns of differences." It is supposed and hoped that the French government will one day give to the world this truly "greatest and most imposing monument of calculation," which at present is in MS. in the library of the observatory at Paris. M. de Prony was a corresponding member of our royal society of literature. Born, 1755; died, 1839.

RENNELL, THOMAS, D.D., dean of Winchester. This excellent divine was unquestionably one of the most learned and eloquent preachers of his time; so eloquent, indeed, that the celebrated William Pitt once called him the "Demosthenes of the Pulpit;" a compliment the more forcible as coming from one who was not merely well qualified to apportion the praise due to oratory, but also of too cool and cautious a temperament to bestow it either lavishly or lightly. In 1786 he was appointed to the living of Alton, in Hampshire, where he is even yet spoken of in terms of the most affectionate respect by all denominations of Christians, for the tolerance of his conversation and the unimpeachable morality of his life. In 1803 he was appointed to the deanery of Winchester, by his admirer and friend, Mr. Pitt. The appointment reflected credit equally upon the great minister's discernment and impartiality—for it was made very soon after his return to office, which he quitted on account of his strenuous advocacy of Catholic emancipation, of which Dr. Rennell was avowedly an equally strenuous opponent. But the uncompromising integrity which disdained concealment of opinions, which were sincerely and warmly entertained upon a subject of national importance, was too greatly partaken by the minister himself to prevent him from appreciating and rewarding zeal, learning, and piety, such as those of Dr. Rennell. Though his scholarship was at once profound and various, he published nothing but a volume of sermons—principally a selection from those which he preached at the Temple church, London, and in the cathedral of Winchester. The perusal of this one volume causes us to regret that he published no more; for in addition to the most fervent and sound piety, couched in the most glowing and nervous language, they incidentally afford abundant proof of the correctness of the opinion given by a contemporary writer, that—"both as a theologian and a scholar in the most comprehensive sense of the words, Dr. Rennell was one of the most remarkable and accomplished men of the age." Late in life he lost his lady, the daughter of Sir William Blackstone. Born, 1753; died, 1840. [A notice of Dr. Rennell's son (the Rev. T. Rennell, vicar of Kensington, and a prebendary of Salisbury), will be found in the previous part of this volume.]

RICKMAN, JOHN, F.R.S., clerk assistant at the table of the House of Commons. This gentleman first brought himself into public notice by the great attention he paid to the means of obtaining accurate statistical knowledge of the population, &c. of Great Britain. He was for 36 years officially connected with the House of Commons, and his life may be best described as one course of laudable zeal in the service of others. He lived on terms of intimacy with Southey, Coleridge, Charles Lamb, Telford the celebrated engineer, and many other men, whose congenial tastes and acquirements rendered the connection mutually pleasant and desirable. Mr. Sharon Turner, in sketching Mr. Rickman's character, says, "He was peculiarly a man of facts and realities, and well adapted to all things that required close attention, investigation, and continued mental labour;" and, speaking of his skill and efficiency in the arrangement of the population census, he observes, that "his publications on this great subject deserve the highest commendations for the labour, discrimination, force of mind, patience of examination, sound judgment, and varied knowledge which they display." Born, 1771; died, 1841.

RIES, FERDINAND, an eminent musical composer and performer, was born at Bonn, in 1793, and was early distinguished for the precocity of his genius. He became a pupil of Beethoven, and as a pianist he had few superiors. From the year 1813 to 1825, he resided in England, and produced numerous musical compositions, some of which, though not the generality of them, possess first-rate merit. He died at Frankfurt, Jan. 1838.

RIGAUD, STEPHEN PETER, Savilian professor of astronomy, and reader of experimental philosophy in the university of Oxford. Though of French extraction he was born at Richmond, in Surrey, and may almost be said to have been the inheritor of scientific pursuits, both his father and grandfather having filled the office of observer in the royal observatory at Kew. His contributions to the scientific works of the day were both numerous and valuable; and the world owes to his diligence the preservation of many particulars respecting Bradley, Harriot, and other eminent men of science, whose biographies had previously been either neglected, or inaccurately edited. Born, 1775; died, 1839.

ROBERTS, EMMA, a lady of distinguished literary talent, and an early friend of the highly-gifted but ill-fated Miss Landon. Miss Roberts was the author of "Memoirs of the Rival Houses of York and Lancaster, historical and biographical," 2 vols.; "Oriental Scenes, Sketches, and Tales," &c. She died at Poonah, in India, Sept. 1840; the object of her mission thither having been the further illustration of life and manners in the East.

ROLLE, Right Hon. JOHN, lord, the representative of an ancient Devonshire family, was born in 1750; first returned to parliament for Devon, in 1779, and succeeded to his estates on the death of his father in 1797, having in the previous year been raised to the peerage. He was a zealous Tory, and took so warm a part in the discussion of the regency bill in 1789, that he proposed an amendment in the marriage clause, stigmatizing by name as unlawful the prince of Wales's union with Mrs. Fitzherbert. During his long life he was a consistent and unshaken politician, a kind and indulgent landlord, and a liberal dispenser of the gifts of fortune in all benevolent undertakings, particularly as regarded his native country. He died June, 1843, in the 62nd year of his age.

ROSAPINA, FRANCESCO, a celebrated Italian engraver, was born near Rimini, in 1762, and settled at Bologna. Many noble engravings from the old masters owe their existence to his superior skill; but perhaps his greatest performance is the work known the drawings and most of the engravings as the "Gallery of Bologna", of which all were executed by his own hand. Died, 1841.

SACY, Baron SILVESTRE DE, a profound and various scholar, but especially eminent as an orientalist. He was educated at home under the eye of an intellectual and accomplished mother, and obtained an acquaintance with Greek and Latin literature that would of itself have made the fame of an ordinary man. At the early age of twelve he was fortunate enough to attract the notice of Berthier, from whom he obtained both his taste for oriental studies and his earliest direction in them. Indeed, so ardent was the young scholar, that his night studies seriously injured his sight. He learned Hebrew, Syriac, and their cognates—Italian, Spanish, German and English. Nor was he a mere reader, as his numerous works sufficiently attest. His "Arabic Grammar;" "Relation de l'Egypte par Abd Allah, Médecin Arabe de Bagdad;" "Exposé de la Religion des Druzes;" "Chrestomathie Arabe;" and "Anthologie Grammaticale Arabe," are especially creditable to his talents, and valuable to students. During the stormy times of the revolution, and the sway of Napoleon, as well as under Louis XVIII., Charles X., and Louis Philippe, the splendid talents of M. de Sacy obtained for him the highest and most valuable literary appointments. As a lecturer, he was singularly brilliant, lucid and effective. In addition to valuable literary offices, he was a peer of France, and an officer of the legion of honour. Nor was his fame confined to France: when George IV. in 1829, put his gold medal at the disposal of our Royal Society of Literature, it was unanimously voted to M. de Sacy. Born, 1759; died, 1839.

SANDFORD, SIR DANIEL KETTER, D.C.L., professor of Greek in the university of Glasgow, was the son of Dr. Sandford, one of the bishops of the Scottish episcopal church. This accomplished scholar and brilliant orator was not more distinguished for his classic attainments, than for the enthusiasm with which he advocated the Reform Bill, and other measures which had for their objects the extension of popular rights and privileges. As a teacher he was highly successful; and to his efforts Scotland is indebted for much of her present eminence, as a school for the study of classic literature. Died, Feb. 9, 1839.

SAURIN, Right Hon. WILLIAM, an eminent Irish lawyer. He was called to the bar in the year 1780; in 1798 he received a patent of precedence; which was soon followed by his appointment to the office of solicitor-general. As a member of the Irish parliament he took an extremely active part in the politics of the latter end of the 18th and commencement of the 19th centuries; yet, turbulent as were the times, and fierce as were the political antagonists to whom he was opposed, his personal integrity and highly honourable feelings were on all hands admitted. His powers as a debater, and his eminence and celebrity as a lawyer, caused him, in 1807, to be made attorney-general for Ireland, and he held that important office until 1822, when he was succeeded by Mr., now Lord Plunkett. Though for many years previous to his death he had been greatly afflicted in health, his faculties remained unimpaired to the last; and even so lately as 1829 his splendid reputation caused the public anticipation to turn to him as the probable successor of Sir Anthony Hart in the Irish chancellorship. Born, 1767; died, 1840.

SEPPINGS, Sir ROBERT, F.R.S., surveyor of the British navy, was in the service of his country, in that capacity, for nearly fifty years, during which period his improvements in ship-building were numerous and important, and as such were, on various occasions, gratefully acknowledged by both houses of parliament. He died, aged 72, in April, 1840.

SHUTTLEWORTH, the Right Rev. PHILIP NICHOLAS, bishop of Chichester, was born in 1782, at Kirkham, Lancashire. He received his education at Winchester, and New College, Oxford, and was distinguished at both these learned seminaries by his very superior attainments: at the latter, in 1803, contemporaneous with bishop Heber's celebrated English poem "Palestine" he gained the Latin verse prize by a splendid composition entitled "Byzantium." In the outset of his career he was for several years engaged in noble families as a tutor; in which capacity he had the advantages to be derived from travelling on the continent, and of forming friendships worthy of remembrance in after life. For some considerable time he resided in Oxford, and filled the situation of tutor to his college; and when, in 1822, the wardenship of New College became vacant, he was unanimously elected to that honourable station. In 1840 Dr. Shuttleworth was promoted to the see of Chichester; but his episcopal dignity was of brief duration; this able prelate dying in January, 1842. His principal works are a "Discourse on the Consistency of the whole Scheme of Revelation with itself, and with human Reason;" "Scripture not Tradition," in which his objections to Puseyism are stated with great force and learning; a volume of excellent sermons, &c.

SINGH, MAHA RAJA RUMJEET, chief of Lahore and Cashmere. Perhaps neither ancient nor modern times can furnish a more striking proof of the power that lies in an iron and energetic will than is furnished by the singular career of this chief, who, from being the leader of a gang of robbers, became the absolute despot of despots, whose word was law to princes, and who ruled twenty millions of men with a rod of iron. Brave, active, and remorseless, his bandit troops swelled its numbers, and became an army; the mere specter of earth which he first seized upon by the right of the strongest, a centre from which he carried the sword or the snare into the dominions of his neighbors. Of education he was so destitute that he could not read; but he had a very powerful memory, much shrewdness, and great discrimination; and as he was in the daily habit of being read to in both Persian and Hindoo, it is probable that he was no great loser by his want of early tuition. Accessible to all ranks of his people, he administered justice with the utmost impartiality—at least, when his own interests did not stand in the way of an equitable decision; but in taxing, or, to speak more correctly, in plundering the people who were unhappy enough to fall beneath his sway, he was absolutely merciless. In his punishments, too, though he affected to dislike taking away life, he was truly eastern in his cruelty, the criminal very commonly having his ears or nose cut off, and being reduced to life-long lameness by the division of the tendon Achilles. Avarice seems to have been fully as much his incentive to warfare as ambition was; for he has been known to undertake a military expedition against a distant prince who had the reputation of possessing particularly fine horses or costly jewels. Among his immensely valuable treasures of the latter kind was the celebrated Kha-i-Noor, or Mountain of Light. This invaluable diamond, which has long been the envy of the princes of India, he left as a legacy to be worn by the chief idol of Juggernaut. In stature he was very short, and the naturally sinister expression of his countenance was much increased by the loss of his left eye by the small-pox. His long grey tapering beard which descended below his breast, gave him something of a venerable appearance.

At his death, as though his life had not been sufficiently productive of human misery, four of his princesses and seven slave girls were permitted—or, as we fear is far more likely compelled—to burn themselves upon his funeral pyre. Born, 1779; died, 1830. (In our "Scientific and Literary Treasury," just published, we have stated that the suttees, or voluntary immolation of Hindoo widows, has been wisely and mercifully abolished in British India; and as the natives seem to rejoice at its abolition, we have reason to hope that this barbarous relic of a superstitious devotion will soon be rendered obsolete wherever it may still happen to exist.)

SMITH, Admiral Sir SIDNEY, G.C.B., a chivalric and far famed British officer, was the son of a captain in the army, John Spencer Smith, Esq., of Midgham, Sussex. Sir Sidney received his education chiefly under Dr. Vicesimus Knox, of Tunbridge school; but manifesting a great desire for a naval life, he was sent, before he was twelve years of age, as a midshipman on board the Sandwich, under Lord Rodney. In 1780 he became a lieutenant; in 1782, a commander; and, in 1783, obtained post rank, with the command of the Nemesis of 38 guns. The American war having just been brought to a close, and there being no opportunity of acting in the navy of his own country, the young captain (who was not quite twenty) entered, with the permission of his sovereign, into the service of the king of Sweden, who presented him with the grand cross of the order of the Sword, for the skill and energy he displayed on several occasions, particularly in an attack on a Russian flotilla, a great part of which he destroyed. A peace between Sweden and Russia again threw him out of active life, and he travelled into the south of Europe. Hearing that Lord Hood had got possession of Toulon, he hastened thither, and offered his services. Soon after his arrival it was determined to evacuate the city; and the destruction of the ships of war, which could not be carried off, was entrusted to Sir Sidney, who performed the difficult and hazardous exploit with signal ability. He was now appointed to the command of the Diamond frigate, of 38 guns, in which, with a small flotilla under his direction, he greatly annoyed the enemy; but in a gallant attempt to cut out a ship at Havre-de-Grace, he was taken prisoner, and, on pretence of having violated the law of nations, by landing assassins in France, he was confined for two years in the prison of the Temple, at Paris. At length, by the address and intrepidity of a French officer, named Philippeaux, and two of his friends, Sir Sidney's escape was somewhat mysteriously effected. An order of the minister of the day was forged, directing the gaoler of the Temple to deliver to the bearers Le chevalier Sidney Smith, for the purpose of transferring him to another prison; and having thus far succeeded, he and Philippeaux proceeded, by means of false passports, to Rouen, and thence, in an open boat, to the Channel, where they were taken up by the Argo frigate, which soon landed them at Portsmouth. In commenting on this singular escape, Captain Brenton, in his Naval History, asserts, that it had been connived at by the French authorities. "Of this," he adds, "perhaps even Sir Sidney himself was at the time ignorant. The police of France was too vigilant and too avaricious to allow a victim to elude its grasp without a sufficient reason; and a bribe of 3000*l.* sent to one of the directory, by our own government, unlocked the gates of the Temple, and removed all obstructions to the sea-coast." In 1798 he sailed in the Tigre of 80 guns, for the Mediterranean, to assume a distinct command, as a commodore, on the coast of Egypt. In March, 1799, he proceeded to St. Jean d'Acre; and, on the 16th, captured a French flotilla, the guns of which he employed in the defence of Acre, against Buonaparte, who invested it two days after. Many fierce contests followed, and the French repeatedly endeavoured to carry the place by storm; but the determined valour of the British commodore and his gallant band, assisted by the troops of Hassan Bey, frustrated every attempt. Buonaparte having quitted Egypt, Sir Sidney negotiated with general Kieber for the evacuation of the country, and by a treaty signed at Al Arisch, that desirable event was agreed to; but, though highly advantageous, the British government refused to abide by it. In 1801, he co-operated, at the head of a party of seamen, with the army sent out to Egypt under Abercrombie; and he was wounded in the battle which proved fatal to the gallant general. On his return to England, he received a valuable sword, with the freedom of the city, from the corporation of London; and at the general election, in 1802, he was returned to parliament as one of the representatives for Rochester. In 1803 he was appointed to the Antelope, of 50 guns, with the command of a flying squadron; in 1804 he was made a colonel of marines; and in 1805 he attained the rank of rear-admiral of the blue. In the following year he hoisted his flag on board the Pompey, of 80 guns, in which he proceeded to the Mediterranean; and Lord Collingwood, the commander-in-chief on that station, soon afterwards despatched him with a squadron intended to harass the French in the kingdom of Naples, which they had recently conquered. Having greatly annoyed the enemy, and compelled the garrison of the island of Capri to surrender, he returned. About this time he was presented with the grand cross of the order of St. Ferdinand. In 1807 he conveyed the royal family of Portugal to South America; and, during the same year, distinguished himself under admiral Duckworth, against the Turks, in the Dardanelles. In 1809 he commanded a squadron on the South American station; a detachment of which, under captain Yeo, expelled the French from Cayenne. In 1810 he was promoted to the rank of vice-admiral, and was appointed second in command in the Mediterranean in 1812. On his return to England, in 1814, he was presented with the freedom of Plymouth; in the following year he was made a knight commander of the Bath; in 1821, a full admiral; and, in 1830, he was appointed lieutenant-general of marines, succeeding therein his late majesty William IV.—A more chivalric character than Sir Sidney Smith is not to be found among the heroes of modern times; and those who recollect his brilliant career will be ready to subscribe to the eulogium passed on him by his biographer, E. Howard, esq., "All his public actions seem to have been less the off-spring of mere military calculation and naval science, than of the intuition of the most romantic courage and the highest moral feeling, always controlled by prudence and intrepidity, that no danger, however sudden, could surprise, and no difficulty, however menacing, vanquish." But though, in resolution and love of enterprise Sir Sidney Smith has scarcely ever been surpassed, on some occasions he suffered his ardour to involve him in difficulties, which a commander less daring and impetuous would have perhaps avoided; but had his caution been greater, his exploits would not have been so honourable to himself, or so beneficial to his country. There was a time when his very name, like that of Nelson, struck terror into our enemies; and his constitutional activity kept him constantly on the alert to take advantage of every opportunity to harass and annoy them.—We have yet to notice that, in 1814, he endeavoured to procure, from the congress of Vienna the abolition of the slave trade, and a conjoint attack of the sovereigns upon the piratical states of Barbary; but his laudable exertions proved fruitless. He then formed at Paris an association called the Anti-Piratic; and although it does not appear to have met with any decided support, there is reason to believe that the objects it expressed, and the principles it espoused, had considerable weight in rendering the subjugation of Algiers a popular measure in France, if it did not immediately lead to that event. At the close of the war Sir Sidney's services were rewarded with a pension of 1000*l.* a year. He died, at his residence in Paris, on the 26th of May, 1840, aged 76.

SMITH, WILLIAM, LL.D., F.G.S., an eminent geologist, whose acute and elaborate analysis of English strata caused professor Sedgwick, himself one of the greatest geologists of the present century, to bestow upon him the complimentary title of "the father of English geology." He was born at Churchill, in Oxfordshire; and though he inherited a small patrimony, and was of decidedly respectable family, his early education was but scanty; and at about 18 years of age he put himself under the tuition of Mr. Webb, of Stow-in-the-Wold, a land surveyor of great ability and extensive practice. It is conjectured that his attention was first turned towards geological analysis by the striking contrast which he observed between the stonebrash hills of Oxfordshire, and the red marl and llas of Worcester-shire; certain it is, that this contrast first fell beneath his notice in 1789, and that only two years later he commenced that systematic analysis of English strata, by which he has rendered so much good service to science. From 1791 to 1799 Mr. Smith was in constant employment as a land surveyor and civil engineer in the neighbourhood of Bath, and during the latter six years of that time was engaged in executing the Somerset Coal Canal. Familiar from youth with the oolitic formations of Oxfordshire, Mr. Smith's Somersetshire experience put him in possession of novel and extensive generalizations which could not be otherwise than immensely important in the hands of one at once so acute and so persevering. During this period he also extended his surveys through the Cotswold Hills, and became acquainted with the general facts of the range of the oolitic escarpment towards the north of England. From 1799, when his engagement ceased as engineer to the Somerset Coal Canal, to 1806, Mr. Smith was engaged either in travelling, or in what may be termed the mere casual exercise of his profession as a geologist. In 1806 he published "A Treatise on Irrigation," an art in which his profession had given him much practice, and in which his geological studies and discoveries had enabled him to make some importantly valuable improvements. From this time he rapidly and steadily rose into notice in the scientific world. In 1806 his collection of organic remains was visited, and carefully examined by the president and principal members of the Geological Society; and, in the first volume of the Society's "Transactions," which appeared in 1811, his discoveries are prominently and favourably noticed. But it was not until 1813 that he gave to the world the long promised and much desired "Delimitation of the Strata of England and Wales," in the form of a handsomely engraved map. This publication led to the purchase, in the same year, by the British Museum, of the whole of his organic remains, at the price of 500*l.*, and the task of arranging and describing this curious and valuable collection caused him to publish "Strata Identified by Organized Fossils," and "Stratigraphical System of Organized Fossils." From 1815 to 1823 Mr. Smith published twenty geological maps of various counties of England, delivered a series of lectures in several provincial towns, and travelled from place to place in search of new facts, having for a long time "scarcely any home but the rocks, except one year which he passed at Kirkby Lonsdale, in Westmoreland." In 1833 the degree of LL.D. was conferred upon him by Trinity college, Dublin. But, though careful he became embarrassed; and it was at length well known to his scientific friends and other influential persons, that this excellent and highly-gifted man, now fast falling into the "sere and yellow leaf" of age, was without the means of procuring even the common comforts of life. An application was accordingly made to the crown by his zealous friends, and a pension of 100*l.* per annum was immediately bestowed upon him. Born, 1769; died, 1840.

SMYTH, Sir JAMES CARMICHAEL, a major-general, and governor of British Guiana and Demerara. He entered the service in 1793, as a lieutenant of the royal engineers, attained the rank of colonel in 1813; commanded the engineers at the battle of Waterloo; was made aide-de-camp to the prince regent, and colonel in the army, and was also rewarded by the emperors of Russia and Austria with the orders of St. Vladimir and Maria Theresa. He was created a baronet in 1821, and promoted to the rank of major-general in 1824. As governor of Guiana he displayed senatorial and legislative abilities of the first order; and he died, greatly lamented by all classes in the colony, in March, 1838.

SOTHERON, Admiral FRANK, a gallant English officer. His services during several years of the hottest warfare, procured him the distinguished honour of being intrusted by Lord Nelson with the defence of the bay of Naples at the time of the French usurpation there; and the admirable arrangements made by him prevented the tremendous mischief which the slightest want of prudence would have given rise to. He was of a very wealthy landed family in Nottingham, and Yorkshire, which former county he for some years represented in parliament. Born, 1767; died, 1839.

STANDISH, FRANK HALL, author of the "Life of Voltaire," &c. This gentleman, well known by his elegant taste for the arts, was the son of Anthony Hall, esq. of Flax, in the county of Durham; and having succeeded to the estates of Sir Frank Standish, bart., as cousin and heir at law, assumed the name, &c. by royal licence. Having the opportunity of gratifying his natural inclination, by foreign travels, for acquiring information on classic antiquities and literature, and being moreover possessed of an exquisite judgment as a connoisseur of the fine arts, he made an admirable collection of the best pictures, books, manuscripts, &c. during his sojourn on the continent; the whole of which he bequeathed to Louis Philippe, king of the French, "in token (as he says) of his esteem for a generous and polite nation, one that is always ready to welcome the traveler and relieve the stranger, and one that he has ever gone to with pleasure and quitted with regret. The works published by Mr. Standish are as follows: "The Life of Voltaire;" "The Shores of the Mediterranean;" 2 vols.; "Notices on the Northern Capitals of Europe;" "Seville and its Vicinity;" and a volume of "Poems." Died, aged 42, Dec. 1840.

STANHOPE, Lady HESTER, a very highly accomplished, but no less eccentric English lady, niece of the celebrated William Pitt. Soon after the death of that great statesman, with whom she was domesticated, and with whose pursuits she so much sympathized, as to act upon some occasions as his private secretary, she went to Syria, assumed the dress of a male native of that country, and devoted herself to astrology, in which vain science she was a most implicit believer. Her ladyship had a large pension from the English government, and for many years was possessed of considerable influence over the Turkish pashas, which, however, when habitual carelessness in money matters had deprived her of the means of bribing them, she so entirely lost as to be in actual danger of her life. Of her way of life as well as her way of thinking, some notion will easily be formed from a perusal of her reply to an eminent English traveller, who humanely advised her to quit her perilous and desolate abode, and return to England: "As to leaving this country," said her ladyship, "your advice is in vain: I will never return to England. I am encompassed by perils, true; but I am no stranger to them. I have suffered shipwreck off the coast of Cyprus; I have had the plague here; I fell from my horse near Acre, and was trampled upon by him; I have encountered the robbers of the desert, and when my servants quailed I have galloped in among them, and compelled them to be courteous; and when a horde of plunderers was breaking in at my gate, I sallied out among them sword in hand, and having convinced them that they could not hurt me if they would, I fed them at my gate, and they behaved like thankful beggars. Here I am destined to remain. What is written in the great book of life, who can alter! It is true that I am surrounded by perils; it is true that I am at war with the prince of the mountains, and with the pacha of Acre; it is very true that my enemies are capable of assassination, but if I do perish, my fall shall be a bloody one. I have plenty of arms, good Damascus blades; I use no guns, and while I have an arm to wield a hanjar, these barren rocks shall have a banquet of slaughter before my face looks black in the presence of my enemies." So completely anti-national were the prejudices of this very eccentric lady, that though at the time of her death she had no fewer than twenty-three domestics, not one of them was English, and her last sigh was breathed among foreigners and hirelings. Born, 1766; died, 1839.

TALLEYRAND, CHARLES MAURICE DE PERIGORD, Prince de, was born at Paris in 1754, and was descended from one of the most illustrious houses of France. As he was intended for the church, he entered the seminary of St. Sulpice; and his ready wit, insinuating manners, and a quick penetration into the real characters of men, caused him, in 1780, to be named agent-general for ecclesiastical affairs. The duties of his office did not occupy all his attention; and Mirabeau, at the commencement of the Revolution, pointed out the pretate of Autun (for Talleyrand then occupied that bishopric) as possessing talents equal to the occasion, and as one capable of reading the intricate secrets of cabinets—a prophecy which has been fully verified. From the period of 1789, when he was deputed by the clergy of his diocese to represent them in the assembly of the states-general, he dictated laws which rendered him a favourite with the people, at the same time that he laboured to insinuate himself into the diplomatic agency of the reigning governments. Acting as the representative of the clergy, he proposed the suppression of the payment of tithes, and brought forward the decree which gave their property to aid the service of the state. Deaf in every appeal made by that body, he ceased not to enforce the law which obliged the clergy to swear obedience to the civil power, and officiated in his pontifical robes at the newly-erected altar in the Champ de Mars, on the 14th of July, 1790, where he was the first to take the civic religious oath, and advise the priests to follow his example. He subsequently consecrated the first constitutional bishops, and for this was excommunicated by Pope Pius VI. He then gave up his bishopric, and was elected a member of the Directory for the department of Paris. Mirabeau was then on his death-bed, and named Talleyrand his executor, with Count de la March. He proposed to the Directory the plan of a great national school on philosophical principles; and in the discussion which followed, gave the first ideas for the Institution in aid of the Arts and Sciences, which was established in Paris five years afterwards. In 1792 Talleyrand was sent to England on a secret mission; but as he was suspected both by the Jacobins and the emigrants, his presence was disapproved of, and the English minister gave him and the French ambassador, M. de Chauvelin, orders to quit the English territories within twenty-four hours. He then left France for the United States, and there employed himself in commercial speculations, until he was recalled in 1796 by a decree of the convention. On his return he was appointed minister of foreign affairs, and supported himself with the utmost sang-froid imaginable against the numerous attacks he received from men of different parties. He knew the desire of General Buonaparte to be at the head of the government; and, with Sieyès as his colleague, he became the main spring in directing the movements in the cabinet of the first consul. He was the negotiator with Austria at Luneville, as well as with England in the treaty at Amiens. A brief issued by Pope Pius VII. having released him from the obligation of celibacy, he married Madame Grandt; and on Napoleon becoming emperor, he made him grand chamberlain, and in 1806 created him prince of Benevento, still retaining the foreign portfolio. In March, 1806, he opened negotiations of peace with Mr. Fox, which failed, with the death of the latter great statesman. In 1807, he was made vice grand elector; and superseded, as foreign secretary, by De Champagny, in consequence of his opposition to the project of making Joseph Buonaparte the king of Spain. The first reverse of the French arms increased Napoleon's irritation against his clear-sighted adviser, and he was excluded the cabinet and placed under surveillance. To the secret intrigues of his resentful and active mind, long at work, it is generally understood that Buonaparte owed his fall; coupled as they were with the disasters of the last ill-fated campaign in Russia, Germany, and France. Buonaparte saw his error when too late. He recalled Talleyrand; but the seed had been long sown, and was mature; the web was not to be unwound. No one can tell what influence he exercised but himself; and as by his will he has strictly prohibited his heirs from publishing his memoirs (which, it is said, are deposited in England) before the lapse of thirty years from the day of his death, many a grand secret in diplomacy, and many state mysteries must till that period arrive be impenetrable. He was elected president of the provisional government, on Napoleon's abdication in 1814, and exercised that function till the restoration of the Bourbons; when he was appointed foreign minister, made a peer as Prince Talleyrand, and finally sent ambassador to the congress of Vienna. On Napoleon's return from Elba, the latter attempted, vainly, to attach him to his fortunes; but his sagacious instinct prevailed. He remained steady to the new dynasty, and urged the personal declarations against Napoleon of the 13th and 25th of March, 1815. After the battle of Waterloo, he returned to Paris with Louis XVIII., and was re-appointed foreign minister; but he resigned, rather than put his name to the treaty for the occupation of France. He from that time, till the fall of Charles X., placed himself at the head of the opposition in the Chamber of Peers; and on Louis Philippe becoming king, in 1830, he was sent ambassador to England, in which capacity he remained till 1837. Throughout the varying situations in which he was placed, much as he may be charged with duplicity and selfishness, one prevailing sentiment may be remarked—a strong and unceasing interest for his country's greatness. His sincerity was always questionable; but his firmness of character, his diplomatic superiority, his infinite resources, the clearness of his views, the brilliancy of his wit, and the elegance of his language, all combined to form a being capable of influencing the destinies of a nation. He died at Paris, in the 84th year of his age, on the 17th of May, 1838.—His brother, the duke Archambault de Talleyrand Perigord, father of the duke de Dino, died a few weeks before the prince, at St. Germaine, aged 76; and his uncle, the cardinal de Talleyrand, who was grand almoner of France, died in 1830.

TAYLOR, Lieut.-gen. Sir HERBERT, entered the army in 1793, and served in the campaign of that and the following year. He was present at the sieges of Valenciennes and Dunkirk, and at numerous other affairs of minor importance, and was in the memorable retreat through Holland. Having acted as an assistant secretary to Sir James Murray, he was continued in that capacity by the duke of York, and subsequently was made secretary to the commander of the British forces on the continent, in which situation he was under both general Harcourt and Sir David Dundas. In 1793 he returned to England, having the appointment of aide-de-camp to the commander-in-chief. He subsequently was appointed private secretary to the duke of York, in which capacity he continued, until appointed to the same office to George III. As military secretary, Sir Herbert did very much towards bringing the army into its present state of excellent discipline, and a state of comfort little thought of in former years; and as private secretary to the duke of York, George III., and queen Charlotte, it is sufficient to say that he was executor to the will of the first, trustee to the private property of the second, and warmly patronised by the third, who bestowed upon him the highly lucrative post of master of St. Katharine's Hospital, in the Regent's Park. In addition to his military services, Sir Herbert on several occasions was entrusted with political missions, in which he displayed considerable tact, and gave great satisfaction at home. Born, 1774; died, 1830.

TESSIER, M., an eminent French writer on agriculture, to which, as a science, he had devoted a long life, died at Paris, in December, 1837, aged 94. During the period of revolutionary anarchy, this gentleman lived in retirement in Normandy, still however actively engaged in his favourite pursuit. He was the editor of the "Annals of French Agriculture," a voluminous periodical work; director of the royal flocks at Rambouillet, a knight of the legion of honour, and a member of the Institute. He was also the early patron of Cuvier, being the first to discover his talents and introduce him to the scientific world.

THOMSON, the Right Hon. CHARLES WILLIAM POULETT, baron SYDENHAM, governor-general of Canada, was the son of Mr. J. Poulett Thomson, a London merchant, and born in 1793. When about twenty, he became resident in St. Petersburg as the correspondent of his father's firm; and until his accession to public office in 1830, he continued to be connected with the mercantile business. His political life commenced in 1826, as member for Dover; but in 1830 being returned for both Dover and Manchester, he gave preference to the latter important commercial town. On the formation of the Reform cabinet he was appointed vice-president of the board of trade and treasurer of the navy; he became president of the board of trade in 1834; and in 1839 succeeded lord Durham as governor-general in Canada. He arrived at Quebec in October, 1839, assumed the reins of government, and in the following year her majesty conferred on him the peerage of the United Kingdom, by the title of baron Sydenham, of Toronto. Under his administration the prosperity of Canada was gradually recovering, but he did not live to carry into execution many judicious measures for the colony which he had contemplated. Whilst riding near Kingston, on the 5th of September, 1841, lord Sydenham met with an accident by the falling of his horse, which terminated fatally on the 19th.

THORNTON, SAMUEL, of Clapham Park, Surrey, was a director of the Bank of England for the extraordinary period of fifty-three years, and an active M.P. nearly forty years. From 1784 to 1806 he represented the town of Kingston-upon-Hull, and from 1807 to 1818 the county of Surrey. His sagacious counsels had always great influence at the Bank of England, and when the memorable stoppage of cash payments occurred in 1797 he was the governor. In the various duties he had to perform, whether as a bank director, a member of parliament, a governor of Greenwich hospital, or as the head of a mercantile firm, he was able, zealous, and indefatigable. Died, July 3, 1838, aged 83.

THORNTON, Lieut.-gen. Sir WILLIAM, K.C.B., a gallant officer who served with great distinction, both in the Peninsula and in America. He was present at the celebrated siege of St. Sebastian, and in the actions of the Bidassoa, Nivelle, Nive, and Adour, and in the investment of Bayonne. For the battle of the Nive, in which the 85th light infantry, which he commanded, behaved with signal gallantry and steadiness, he received a medal. In 1814 he sailed with his regiment for America, to make part of the force of major general Ross. In this expedition he commanded the light brigade and advance in the Chesapeake, and at the battle of Bladensburg, which latter led to the capture of the city of Washington. On this occasion he was so severely wounded that he was obliged to be left a prisoner in the hands of the enemy. Commodore Barney, of the U. S. navy, being taken prisoner shortly afterwards, was exchanged for colonel Thornton, who proceeded to command the advance of the expedition against New Orleans. He was in all the subsequent engagements in that war until the 6th of January, 1815, when, in the general attack on the enemy's lines, he was so severely wounded at the head of a detached corps, on the right bank of the Mississippi, that his return to England was deemed absolutely essential to his recovery, and he arrived in the March following. In 1819 he received the appointment of deputy adjutant-general in Ireland, that of major-general in 1825, and lieutenant-general in 1838; and in 1839 had the 85th foot—on the death of Sir Herbert Taylor, in lieu of the 96th. Fatigue, and the severe suffering he had endured from his wounds, at length broke down the fine mind of this gallant officer. For a considerable time previous to his melancholy death he was subject to most singular delusions; but in the intervals of these delusions he was so apparently sane, and so little likely to injure either himself or others, that no pains were taken to restrain or watch him; and on the 6th of April, 1840, this gallant officer, in a fit of insanity, put an end to his own existence.

TOBIN, GEORGE, a British admiral, the son of James Tobin, esq., of Nevill, was born at Salisbury in 1768, and entered the navy when twelve years of age, as a midshipman on board the Namur, in which he sailed to the West Indies, and was in Rodney's memorable action on the 9th and 12th of April, 1782. He was subsequently engaged in various services; obtained the rank of post-captain in 1802, and in 1804 he was appointed to the Northumberland, 74 guns. The following year he commanded the Princess Charlotte frigate (afterwards called the Andromache), in which he performed many valuable services to his country, by harassing and capturing the enemy's ships, and by ably escorting several fleets of merchantmen. His last active duty was on the 27th of March, 1814, when he was selected by admiral Penrose to lead the fleet in forcing the passage of the Gironde; and at the close of the war he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral. He was a vigilant and skilful officer; at the same time generous and indulgent to those under his command, and an accomplished gentleman. Died, April 10, 1838.

usually early age, it must be remembered, while Shepherd, Best, and Lens, were in the zenith of their powers and reputation; and he maintained his position subsequently with such opponents as Copley (afterwards lord Lyndhurst) Wilde, and Denham. He was made a baron of the exchequer in 1827, and in 1834 he became a judge of the common pleas, and a privy-councillor. In private he was as amiable, as in public he was able. Born, 1772; died, 1839.

WARD, Right Rev. WILLIAM, bishop of Sodor and Man, born in 1763, was a prelate distinguished for the zealous discharge of his duties, for his benevolence, and, in an especial manner, for the conscientious (and at last, successful) appeals he made against the proposed measure of merging the diocese of Sodor and Man in that of Carlisle. He was a prebendary of Salisbury; held the rectories of Great Horkesley and Alphanstone, in Essex; and through the interest of the earl of Ripon, to whom he had been tutor, he obtained, in 1827, that prelatical preferment for which he was so well qualified. Died, Jan. 26, 1838.

WELLESLEY, RICHARD COLLEY, Marquis. This distinguished nobleman, who for more than half a century ranked among the very first of British statesmen and diplomatists, was the eldest child of the first earl of Mornington, and a native of Ireland, being born in Dublin in June, 1760. At an early age he was placed at Eton, and in due time transferred to Oxford; and it appears that at both those great seats of learning his superior classical attainments not only attracted the notice of his contemporaries, but far excelled the generality of even the most eminent amongst that learned body. His studies at the university being concluded, viscount Wellesley (for such was then his title by courtesy) returned to his native country, his father dying before he attained his majority in 1781. Immediately after, the young earl of Mornington took his seat in the Irish House of Peers; but this was a theatre of operations too circumscribed for the proper display of his abilities; nor was it till after his entrance into the British House of Commons, (first as member for Bernalston, and subsequently for New Windsor) that his statesman-like qualities could find ample room for their development. He was created a British privy councillor in 1793; and in 1797 he succeeded lord Cornwallis in the government of India, having been, at the same time, raised to the British peerage by the title of baron Wellesley, in right of which he continued to sit in the House of Lords. Accompanied by his illustrious brother, colonel Wellesley, afterwards duke of Wellington, he arrived, at a most critical period for the safety of our Eastern possessions, to take the supreme command. Bonaparte had accomplished the conquest of Egypt, and was supposed to meditate an attack upon our Indian possessions. The spirit of Tippoo Saib, sovereign of the Mysore, ranked under his losses; and emissaries from the French government encouraged him in his secret plans for the recovery of the district of Colmbatore and the hill fortresses which he had been compelled to surrender. The first step taken by his lordship was to secure and fortify the island of Perim, which commands the entrance to the Straits of Babelmandel; the next was to negotiate with Tippoo for the purpose of inducing him to abstain from intercourse with the French. The sultan, however, entertained a strong conviction that his true interests would be promoted by an alliance with the Directory of France. This being evident to the governor-general, he determined to strike an immediate blow, and the army, under general (afterwards lord) Harris, was ordered to invest Seringapatam. The siege lasted a month—the town was taken by assault—the sultan slain, and his dominions partitioned. The governor-general was immediately raised a step in the Irish Peerage, when he received the title of marquis Wellesley. Following up the energetic measures he had so successfully commenced, we soon find the noble marquis engaged in making a vice-regal progress through the northern provinces of India, visiting the native princes, redressing grievances, and laying upon a broad basis the foundations of that vast and mighty empire which has ever since been the admiration and envy of the world. We, of course, pass over the various achievements by which, under the governor-general's direction, his illustrious brother and other British commanders succeeded in bringing to a successful termination the desperate wars in which they were engaged. At length, in 1803, he was, at his own request, recalled from the government of India; the East India Company having, in the course of his wise administration, and by the policy of his financial plans, raised their revenue from seven millions to upwards of fifteen millions annually. On his return the ministers of the crown, as well as the East India Company, expressed the deep sense they entertained of his splendid services; but as there were many who thought his administration had been needlessly expensive, and that his conduct was, in some instances, unjust to the native princes, articles of impeachment were presented against him by Mr. Paoli, a member of the House of Commons: they were, however, soon withdrawn, and a vote obtained in his favour. In 1809 his lordship was appointed ambassador to the supreme central junta of Spain; but dissensions in the British cabinet, and the fact that on the Peninsula military services were more required than diplomatic negotiations, caused his speedy return. On the death of the duke of Portland the Perceval government was formed, and the marquis Wellesley was prevailed upon to accept the office of secretary of state for foreign affairs. This he held from Dec. 1809, till Jan. 1812, but differing from his colleagues on the Roman Catholic claims, and on other material points, he withdrew from the government. On the formation of lord Liverpool's administration, after Mr. Perceval had been assassinated, his lordship remained in opposition, during which time he repeatedly called the attention of parliament to the situation in which his illustrious brother was placed in the Peninsula. He described the conduct of the Spanish government as feeble, irregular, and ill-directed; while he depicted the system adopted by the British ministers as "timid without prudence, and narrow without economy—profuse without the fruits of expenditure, and slow without the benefits of caution." In December, 1821, lord Wellesley was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, sir Robert Peel being the home secretary. This, while it raised the hopes of the Roman Catholics, naturally disappointed the Protestants; and his arrival was converted into a signal for the renewed jealousy and rancour of both parties. His duties were, consequently, most arduous; and it is but bare justice to say that throughout his viceregal career he evinced great wisdom, discretion, and impartiality. His brother the duke having come into power, the noble marquis, in 1828, resigned his post, and continued out of office till lord Grey took the head of the government, when a second time, in 1833, he was appointed to the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland, having for a short time previously filled the office of lord-steward. During the administration of sir Robert Peel, 1834-5, lord Wellesley held no official appointment; but on the formation of the second Melbourne ministry, in April, 1835, he accepted the appointment of lord chamberlain. His lordship, however, resigned it in the course of the same year, and never afterwards filled any public employment. He had at that period attained the very advanced age of 77; his health began to decline; with the exception of his brothers, the friends of his early years had withdrawn into retirement or sunk into the grave; and the venerable statesman, who had lived to see the wisdom of his Indian government gratefully acknowledged not only by his early contemporaries, but confirmed by subsequent events, and ratified by a succeeding generation—thought the time had at length arrived for that season of repose which it is so desirable should intervene between the cessation of active pursuits and the close of human existence. His death took place on the 26th of September, 1842, his lordship being in the 83d year of his age. He had been the subject of five successive sovereigns—namely, George II., George III., George IV., William IV., and Victoria. His lordship's father, as before observed, died in 1781, but his mother survived her husband during the long period of half a century. Her ladyship's death took place in 1831, at the advanced age of 89 years. She lived to see four of her sons attain to seats in the House of Lords by means of their own unaided merits, and in reward of public services never surpassed by any set of men, and certainly never equalled by the members of an individual family.

WHITTINGHAM, Sir SAMUEL FORD, a lieutenant-general in the British service, and who at the time of his death was commander-in-chief at Madras. He passed through the various gradations as a cavalry officer, until he was appointed deputy assistant quarter-master-general in the army under the duke of Wellington. This was in 1809; after which he served with the Portuguese army; and was subsequently employed in America. But the chief scene of his services was with the Spanish troops during the Peninsular war; having been aid-de-camp to general Castanos, and afterwards serving under the duke of Albuquerque. He consequently shared in the battles of Baylen, Barossa, and Talavera, in the latter of which he was severely wounded. In 1812, after having raised and disciplined a large corps of Spanish troops, he was appointed to the command of them, as major-general; and, in junction with the British army at Alicante, he was successfully opposed to the French under marshal Suchet; after which he served with distinction in command of a division of infantry, under Sir John Murray, and subsequently under lord W. Bentinck. As a reward for his services the prince regent appointed him one of his aide-de-camps, and he received the honour of knighthood. He was also invested with the grand cross of the order of San Fernando by the king of Spain, who, on Napoleon's escape from Elba, in 1815, sent expressly for Sir William. In 1819 he was appointed governor of Dominica; but in 1822 his services were transferred to India, as quarter-master-general of the king's troops, and subsequently as a major-general. On returning from India in 1835, he was appointed to the command of the forces in the Windward and Leeward Islands; but he was permitted to resign this post in 1839, in order to take the command in chief at Madras, where he arrived in August, 1840, and died in January, 1841.

WILKIE, Sir DAVID, a painter of distinguished merit, was born near Cupar in Fifeshire, in 1785, his father being a minister of the Scotch church. In 1805 he came to London, and soon attracted notice by the excellence of his earliest efforts; his career of fame commencing with his "Village Politicians" "Blind Fiddler," "Rent Day," &c. His reputation was now established, and in 1811 he was made a Royal Academician, from which period he regularly produced, and as regularly sold at increasing prices, his most celebrated pictures; of which we shall merely mention a few; as "Distraining for Rent," "The Penny Wedding," "Blind Man's Buff," "The Village Festival," (now in the National Gallery), "The Reading of the Will," and "Chelsea Pensioners reading the Gazette of the Battle of Waterloo," (painted for the duke of Wellington, in 1823, for 1200*l*.) In consequence of ill health, brought on by close application, and some serious pecuniary losses, a continental tour was recommended by his physicians; and he accordingly visited Italy and Spain, where he remained till 1828. But his love of art and his habitual industry could neither be restrained by the injunctions of physicians, nor the entreaties of friends; and, accordingly, several finished pictures, altogether different from his former style of execution, soon appeared. Upon this "total change" of style and choice of subjects it has been remarked, that in departing from the principle of the Flemish and Dutch schools, and adopting that of the Spanish, "he determined on the hazardous experiment of resting his future fame on a style utterly opposed to that in which he then stood unrivalled amidst European artists."

Whether the world has gained or lost by this change it is not our province to decide; but we agree with the writer whom we have just quoted, that in his earlier works he added dignity to subjects which were before treated with coarseness, and yet never overstepped 'the modesty of nature'; whereas in his latter productions he has been satisfied with a choice of subjects of a secondary kind, and in which there are many no less eminent than himself.—In January, 1830, on the death of Sir Thomas Lawrence, he was appointed principal painter in ordinary to George IV., whose portrait in the Highland costume, and "His Majesty's Reception at Holyrood-house," he was at that time occupied in painting. On the accession of William IV. the royal favour was continued to him, and he was knighted in 1836. He had not, however, the good fortune to command so large a share of court patronage after the accession of queen Victoria, though he was honoured by sittings from her Majesty for his splendid picture of her "First Council;" and it was by the queen's command that he was sent to the Turkish capital to paint the portrait of the Sultan. This was his last and fatal mission. On his return on board the Oriental steamer, after having touched at Malta and Gibraltar, he was taken suddenly ill, and died in Gibraltar bay, aged 58, June 1, 1841; the last offices of committing his body to the deep being rendered necessary by the strict orders of the governor, who could not allow it to be brought on shore. Among the principal pictures painted by Sir David, in his second or Spanish style, may be named "The Maid of Saragossa," "The Guerilla's Departure" and "Return," "John Knox preaching," "Columbus," "Peep-o'-day-Boys' Cabin," "Mary Queen of Scots escaping from Lochleven Castle," "The Cottar's Saturday Night," "The Empress Josephine and the Fortune-teller," and "The Discovery of the Body of Tippecoo Saib," (painted for the widow of Sir David Baird, at 1800*l.*) He also produced many celebrated portraits. As a man, Sir David Wilkie had the character of being mild and unassuming; as an artist, no difficulties could daunt him, nor could any labour be too great for him to undertake with a view to the attainment of excellence.

WILKINS, WILLIAM, an eminent architect. His chief buildings are St. George's Hospital, the London University, the University Club-house, and the National Gallery, which last has probably provoked more caustic criticism than has been bestowed upon the work of any previous architect. His additions to some collegiate buildings, both in England and Ireland, show great taste and learning. Though popular opinion was in unison with the generally expressed condemnation of the National Gallery, Mr. Wilkins had, on other occasions, given convincing proof of his abilities as an architect; and an able periodical writer observes, "We, who have seen many of his designs for public works, some of which were selected for execution by the government, but abandoned for want of means to complete them, know that had they been executed, his fame as an architect would have been more highly appreciated; but even from those which exist, sufficient testimony may be drawn to exemplify a strong and vigorous mind, and an exceedingly high, correct, and polished taste. His very numerous and extensive engagements in his profession did not prevent him from being an author of some voluminousness. Born, 1778; died, 1839.

WREDE, Field-marshal Prince, an eminent Bavarian soldier and statesman. It was his fate to be a most formidable foe to the gigantic military genius under whom he had obtained the earliest distinction due to his gallantry and skill. In 1805 he served as a Bavarian lieutenant-colonel against Austria and as the ally of France, and distinguished himself so much, that Napoleon personally conferred upon him the then much-coveted grand cross of the legion of honour. In the subsequent actions of that war he still further distinguished himself, and was created a field-marshal, when dangerously wounded, at the decisive battle of Wagram. In the memorable campaign against Russia, too, the contingent army furnished by Bavaria to France was commanded by him; and covered the retreat of the French with such dogged determination, as to lose nearly the whole of its cavalry. In 1813, the political state of things in Europe made it impossible for Bavaria to remain attached to the emperor's cause, but to share his inevitable ruin; and marshal Wrede, as Bavarian plenipotentiary, signed the treaty by which Bavaria declared herself separated from the confederation of the Rhine, and also from the cause of the emperor. Shortly afterwards, Wrede, at the head of a combined Bavarian and Austrian army, made a gallant and skilful, though unsuccessful attempt, to intercept Napoleon at Hanau, after the battle of Leipzig. In 1814 he was actively engaged in France, and with his usual gallantry; and, at the conclusion of the war, he was elevated to the rank of prince, and, shortly afterwards, nominated an honorary knight grand cross of the English order of the Bath. The termination of the war did not terminate his services to his country. As minister of state and inspector-general of the army, he rendered most important benefits. Born, 1767; died, 1839.

YEATES, THOMAS, a celebrated Oriental scholar; author of excellent grammars of the Hebrew and Syriac, and a most laborious editor and translator of portions of the Scripture, as well as of a variety of biblical labours of considerable ingenuity, industry, and value. In early life he was a member and secretary of the Society for promoting Constitutional Information; but for many years previous to his death he took no part in politics. Born, 1768; died, 1838.
